The New Ministry Presented to the Cortes—Montpensier Allowed to Remain in the Country.

MADRID, Sunday, June 20.

The members of the new Ministry were presented to the Cortes yesterday. General PRIM addressed the Chamber. He promised that the Government would observe all the provisions of the Constitution, and exact equal respect for them from the nation. He exhorted the majority of the Cortes to continue united in action, and urged the Republicans to preserve an attitude of moderation.

After a long discussion, the resolution condemning the presence of the Duke of MONTPENSIER in Spain was rejected by a vote of 94 to 67. General PRIM opposed the resolution, arguing that the Duke had perfect liberty to inhabit any part of the country.

Arrest of an Opponent to Serrano—General Prim's Policy.

MADRID, Sunday, June 20.

The President of a Republican Club in Cadiz has been arrested for making a speech against Marshal SERRANO. The action of the authorities caused great excitement in Cadiz.

In the Cortes yesterday General PRIM said the Government must be hard, inflexible, and even cruel in repressing disorder. He also proposed economical reforms in the administration of the finances.

Marshal Serrano Takes the Oath of Office as Regent—Bourbon Intriguers.

MADRID, Saturday, June 19.

On taking the oath of office yesterday, as Regent of Spain, Marshal SERRANO made a speech, in which he promised to respect the Constitution and liberties of the country. President RIVERO, in reply, assured him of the support of all Spaniards.

The Cortes has passed a bill giving the acts of the Provisional Government the force of law, and conferring upon it the power to carry them into effect.

After a stormy debate the Republicans have succeeded in bringing before the Cortes a resolution expressing disapproval of the presence of the Duke of MONTPENSIER in Spain, and demanding that the Government order him to return to Portugal.

General PREZUELA, a strong supporter of the Ex-Queen, arrived here on the pretext of visiting his estates in Segovia, claiming his right to do so as a citizen under the Constitution. He was arrested and sent to Aranjuez to await further orders. He will probably be exiled to the Canaries. It is said that a steamer is now waiting at Cadiz to take him to the islands.

A conspiracy for the restoration of Queen ISABELLA has been discovered at Grenada.

Troubles in the Colonial Parliament—Alleged Bribery.

LONDON, Sunday, June 20.

Later advices from Melbourne report that the troubles in the Colonial Parliament continued. The members expelled for bribery had been reflected, and the parties guilty of bribing the legislators, who were sent to jail by order of the Parliament, had been released by the Judges on the ground of wrongful committal. The Parliament now appeals to the Privy Council.

SOUTH AMERICA.

Opening of the Argentine Chambers—Sarmiento's Speech.

LISBON, Sunday, June 20.

The mail steamer from Rio Janeiro has arrived. She brings dates from Buenos Ayres to the 5th inst.

The session of the Argentine Chambers had commenced. President SARMIENTO, in his opening speech, declared that the strongest friendship existed between the Allied South American Powers. He said they felt none but generous feelings for the Paraguayans, and they now proposed to establish a Provisional Government at Asuncion for the benefit of the people.

Supplementary Concert of the Peace Jubilee.

BOSTON, Sunday, June 20.

The supplementary concert of the Great Peace Festival came off in the Coliseum tonight before an audience of about 15,000, and proved a great success. There were 5,000 choristers, some of them from towns fifteen miles off, and Mme. PAREPA-ROSA, Miss ADELAIDE PHILLIPS and OLE BULL participated. The concert was conducted by Messrs. GILMORE, ZERRAHN and EICHBERG. The former had a very warm reception. It is probable that there will be no more musical entertainments given in the Coliseum this week, at least until Saturday, when a series of popular musical entertainments will probably be inaugurated. In most of the churches, to-day, favorable allusion was made by the preachers to the great moral accomplishments and effects of the Peace Festival. All united in commendation of the affair.

Important Revenue Seizures in Baltimore.

BALTIMORE, Md., Sunday, June 20.

The important seizure for violation of the Internal Revenue laws, made near this city a few days since, was not made public at the request of the officers having the matter in charge. The particulars are as follows: Two weeks since ABERNATHY FULTON, Supervisor of this district, proceeded to make an inspection of ULMAN's large distillery, situated at South Side, Baltimore County, on the Washington turnpike, a few miles from this city. The result of the inspection was the issue of an order by the Supervisor to the Collector of the district, to seize all the property, including buildings, machinery, and apparatus and about 2,000 barrels of whisky, the value of which exceeds $200,000. It is alleged that through connivance or culpable neglect of Government officers, every facility has been afforded the proprietors to perpetrate frauds upon the revenue, so that every section of the revenue law regulating distilleries, the imposition and collection of taxes on distilled spirits, has been violated. The matter will soon come up in the United States District Court.

The following are the latest advices from Shanghae brought by the Great Republic:

The American Minister had returned to Pekin from his southern trip to the Consular posts, accompanied by Consul-General SEWARD, from Shanghae.

An uneasy feeling prevailed among the Chinese officials with reference to the future course of political events at Pekin. There were no complaints concerning foreign matters, and so far everything was working to advantage.

Heavy dust storms were prevalent, and but little rain had fallen for some time.

The Russian man-of-war Port Lieson had arrived from Corea, where she had had a difficulty with the inhabitants, in which several men were killed and wounded.

The Chee-Foo gold fever had entirely died out, and but little interest was manifested in gold mines.

The trade was dull at Tien-tsin, and unless rain fell soon the growing crops would be entirely ruined. The market was bare. The following were the quotations: Sheetings, taels 4.9.0@taels 4.0.0; drills, taels 4.0.0@taels 4.5.5. The Shanghai market was very quiet, with light sales of black and green teas. The present stock of black tea was 207 chests, and of green, 4,800 chests.

The settlements of green teas amounted to 3,572 half chests. Common was quoted at taels 21.7.5@taels 27.0.0. The weather was favorable. Arrivals of teas were looked for. The market for silks was dull; the total settlements to date were 61,130 bales. Exchange on London 6s. 2d.@6s. 2½d.; on Paris 777½f.

The Mikado arrived at Yeddo on the 9th of May. Numerous outrages are reported to have been committed upon foreigners. The English Minister had complained to the Japanese Government regarding the matter.

The anniversary of the birthday of Queen VICTORIA was observed in a splendid manner. Sir HENRY PARKES reviewed the English troops of the garrison and the marines from the fleet. There was a regatta during the day.

The whole fleet of the Mikado had arrived safely at the port of Aryomori. Admiral ENOMOTO was strongly fortified on the island of Yesso, impatiently awaiting an attack by the Mikado's forces. Three of the Admiral's vessels attempted to capture the ram Stonewall, but the attack was unsuccessful. One of the Admiral's vessels was beached and burned.

There were in the port of Hong Kong four English, three French, and one American (the Monocacy) vessels of war. The ship Howell arrived at Yokohama on the 29th of May. Exchange on London, 4s. 7½d.; on Paris, 580f.

THE ILLINOIS RIVER.

Importance of the Proposed Improvements—Appeals for Further Aid from the Government.

General LOGAN has addressed the following letter to the Secretary of War:

WASHINGTON, June 17, 1869.

The importance which we of the West attach to the continuance of the improvement of the Illinois River makes it proper that I should submit to you, in brief, the claims which should commend that subject to your favorable consideration.

In 1823 Congress passed an act entitled "An Act making appropriations for the improvement of certain rivers and harbors," approved Aug. 30, 1852. In the body of that act occurs this section: "For the improvement of the navigation of the Illinois River, $90,000." In 1853 work was commenced under this appropriation. In the work of JOSEPH E. JOHNSTON, Superintendent Western River improvement, (which may be found in Executive document, second session Thirty-third Congress, vol. 1, part 2, 1854 and 1855, page 22?, dated Washington, Sept. 28, 1854, he says: "In the Fall of 1853 the Illinois was surveyed from its mouth to Copperas Creek, 150 miles, and a channel cut through Guilford Bar. The work was resumed in April, 1854, the survey continued to the mouth of the canal, the dredgeboat in the meantime working on Naples Flats. When the survey was finished the dredgeboat was removed to Spring Creek Bar, the one nearest the canal, and employed upon it and Henepin Flats until the 11th of July, when it grounded. The Board of Engineers of Lakes, Harbors and Western Rivers recommended in their report of Aug. 1, 1854, the extension of the survey of the river to La Salle."

In this report he asks for a further appropriation of $20,000, showing that the dredging of the bars and flats in said river was deemed very important to its navigation. I would also call attention to the report of the United States agent, made to Colonel JOHNSTON, dated Aug. 26, 1854, in which he says: "The improvement effected consists in jetting out of Guilford Bar, on the lower part of the river, in the Fall of 1853, making it easy for low-water navigation. * * * In April of the present year, 1,870 cubic yards of shells were removed from Naples flats. When the boat was transferred to Spring Creek Bar, 1,800 yards were removed, making both comparatively easy of passage, but not to the extent contemplated. From thence the boat was removed to Henepin Flats, from which were removed 1,000 yards, when she grounded, and where she now lies waiting for a rise of the river. The river business consists in the transit trade between the Eastern collection districts and the West, via the port of Chicago, to the ports of Alton and St. Louis, and way trade of the river country in both directions. The passage of boats by the Gopher for the months of May, June, July and August, eastward, amount to 459 steamboats and 920 canal-boats and barges, of 112 tons average, being towed by steamtugs. This is for the trade passing eastward. The Western way trade is independent of this."

Following these reports Congress, up to 1868, continuously provided for the continuation of the survey of the said rivers under the direction of the Secretary of War. In June, 1868, the House of Representatives passed a bill making appropriations for the repairs, preservation and completion of certain public works, and for other purposes, in which bill $85,000 were appropriated for the continuation of the work of opening the Illinois River. The bill failed, however, to become a law.

In order that the necessary work on rivers and canals should not stop, Congress, in July of the same year, passed an act entitled "An Act making appropriations to supply the deficiencies in appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1868, and for other purposes;" approved July 25, 1868, which provided "for the repair, preservation, extension and completion of certain public works on rivers and harbors, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, $1,800,000, provided that said expenditure shall not be applied to any works not mentioned in the bill, making appropriations for repair, preservation and completion of certain public works and for other purposes," which passed the House of Representatives June 25, 1868. Under the provisions of this act, the Secretary of War allotted, in accordance with the provisions of the House bill, which failed to become a law, $85,000, to be expended in the continuation of the work upon the Illinois River, by which said allotment and order of the Secretary of War, the said $85,000 became a credit in favor of the Illinois River, the same as if the bill which passed the House of Representatives June 25, 1868, had become a law. But, afterward, on Aug. 27, 1868, on the recommendation of Colonel J. H. WILSON, the Chief of Engineers, General HUMPHREYS ordered a division of the said appropriation of $85,000 to the work on the Rock Island Rapids, which was accordingly done by the approval of the Secretary of War, Aug. 31, 1868, thereby preventing the expenditure of the said sum on the Illinois River, where it legitimately belonged, and expending it where it was not contemplated by law. Congress, at its last session, evidently having the same objects in view which prompted the act of July 25, 1868, passed an act entitled "An Act making an appropriation for the improvement of rivers and harbors for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1869, and the year ending June 30, 1870," the text of which is as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the sum of $2,000,000 is hereby appropriated for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1869, and the year ending June 30, 1870, to be expended for the repair, extension, preservation and completion of work for the improvement of rivers and harbors, under the direction of the Secretary of War, provided that the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to cause such expenditures to be made so as best to subserve the interests of commerce, and he is required to report to Congress the opening of its December session, all expenditures made under the provisions of this act up to that time, in detail. Approved April 10, 1869.

I am informed that the Chief of Engineers has made no recommendation to the Secretary of War for an allotment of any of this appropriation of $2,000,000 to be expended in the improvement of the navigation of the Illinois River.

Why this important work has been overlooked in the allotment of this appropriation, is something which I cannot understand. It certainly cannot be that this law is so construed as to exclude the continuation of the work on the Illinois River. It was evidently intended to only include works or improvements already commenced, and the appropriation might be expended either for the repair of works completed or the extension and continuation of works commenced, or the preservation of those completed or only partially completed.

By comparison of this statement with the statute of July 25, 1868, it will be found that the same language is used in both, and I presume that I am not mistaken when I say that both statutes were prepared by the able Chief of Engineers to the War Department now in charge.

Under the statute of the 26th of July, 1868, an allotment was made by the Secretary of War for the improvement of the Illinois River, on the recommendation of the same Chief of Engineers.

So far as the construction of the law is concerned it has already been properly construed by your predecessor so as to include the work on the Illinois River. It will not do to say that a continuation of this work would not well subserve the interests of commerce. Without going into any discussion on that subject, I will merely refer you to the reports which have been made by different engineers, under sanction of Government, from 1850 to the present time; and especially in this connection do I call your attention to the exhaustive report of Colonel J. H. WILSON, of the date of Feb. 18, 1867, hereto appended, in which he regards it as one of the most important works for the country, in both a military and commercial point of view. Neither will it do to exclude this great interest from its share in that appropriation on the ground of the insufficiency of the appropriation. It was not expected that the appropriation would complete all the works to which it might be applied. The intention clearly was to use it in the best manner for the purpose of the preservation, extension or continuation of the works which were important in the development of a great country.

If we were to wait until we should get appropriations sufficient to complete any one great work made to apply to this patriotic work, we would wait a long time before we should have a sufficient appropriation for that purpose. It is only by applying such amounts as come to us under appropriations from time to time, in the continuation or preservation of a work, that we are enabled to complete the work.

The State of Illinois, at the last session of its Legislature, appropriated $400,000 to be expended on the improvement of the Illinois River; and with a fair allotment of this $2,000,000 Government appropriation we will be enabled to do a permanent work in improving the navigation of that river, so as to insure a good outlet from the great chain of lakes to the Mississippi. This work must not be considered as merely important to the State of Illinois, and that, therefore, that State should complete it, but it must be regarded from a national point of view. No dispassionate mind can regard it otherwise than as a great national work, one that looks to water transportation, at no distant day, to and from the Atlantic ocean.

I do not desire to enter into any lengthy discussion upon this subject with the Secretary of War, being satisfied that a work of so great importance will commend itself to his good judgment. I have therefore preferred merely to call your attention to the statutes and reports directly connected with this enterprise, and as one of the Representatives of the State of Illinois, I deem it not improper to ask you, Sir, that this great interest shall not be ignored, and that a fair, just and proportionate allotment of this national appropriation shall be made. Such allotment, when taken in connection with the one before allotted, which should properly stand to its credit, to be expended under your official direction on the continuation and extension of the improvement of the navigation of the Illinois River will guarantee the success of a great national undertaking, the importance of which cannot be overestimated.

I am, Sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant, JOHN A. LOGAN.

Hon. JOHN A. RAWLINS, Secretary of War, Washington, D. C.

Virginia Politics—Growing Interest in the Elections.

FORTRESS MONROE, Saturday, June 19.

Now that the election is drawing near, the people of Hampton and vicinity are beginning to take quite a lively interest in politics, and registration is progressing rapidly. There seems to be quite a number of aspirants for Congressional honors in this district, who are preparing to take the stump and advocate their claims. Hon. JOSEPH SEGAR, who was formerly United States Senator from this district, announces himself as a candidate at large. Captain H. B. AYRES, an ex-army officer, is also a candidate, and it is said there are several others not yet in the field. The campaign promises to be lively, as each gentleman has claims on the voters, and are all bidding for the colored vote, and whoever is fortunate enough to secure it, will undoubtedly be elected.

WASHINGTON.

The Cuban Question to be Considered in the Cabinet—The Census—Chinese Immigration—Troubles in Mississippi.

Special Dispatches to the New-York Times.

WASHINGTON, Sunday, June 20.

President GRANT is expected to return here to-morrow, and nearly all the members of the Cabinet will be in the city before the middle of the week. It is stated on good authority that at the Cabinet meeting to be held on Tuesday, the Cuban question in connection with the recent arrests of the prominent revolutionary agents in New-York last week, will be considered. The general feeling in Administration circles is that some definite policy in reference to affairs in that island should be adopted.

THE CENSUS.

The Census Committee have decided to distribute several days in advance the schedules for householders and others, so that they may be filled up and ready for the Enumerator when he calls to collect them. This is in accordance with the British practice and with the recommendations of recent international statistical Congresses, particularly the Florence one in 1867.

CHINESE IMMIGRATION.

The subject of Chinese immigration to the Pacific slope will be brought before Congress at its next session. Several prominent Representatives are now on a visit to California, for the express purpose of studying the whole question, and another gentleman leaves here in a few days for San Francisco with similar intentions. It is apprehended that the number of Chinese who will arrive here within ten years will be estimated by millions; and the theory of some newspapers and politicians, that they come merely for the purpose of working, without any intention or desire to participate in our politics, is regarded by many as an assumption not altogether warranted by fact, history or experience.

CITY IMPROVEMENTS.

A local paper this morning has an interesting article on the improvements in this city, in the matter of the erection of blocks of dwellings, stores, &c., showing altogether an excellent exhibit. It closes by suggesting to capitalists the advantages likely to result from the establishment of cotton factories on the Potomac.

AFFAIRS IN MISSISSIPPI.

The War Department is in receipt of information from Mississippi which goes to show that the condition of society there is considerably disturbed, and that the necessary military measures have been taken to prevent the perpetration of outrages by lawless parties.

Dispatches to the Associated Press.

WASHINGTON, Sunday, June 20.

CUBAN AFFAIRS—INSTRUCTIONS TO OFFICIALS.

The revenue and other federal officers were, months ago, specifically instructed by the Government to use due diligence to prevent the sailing of illegal expeditions to the island of Cuba. Action has been taken by them in all cases where information has been furnished, showing a real or intended violation of the Neutrality laws. Sometimes the complaints of Spanish officials were founded on mere conjecture or suspicion.

THE CASE OF DOUGLASS.

Typographical Union No. 101 of this city met last night. The anticipation that the case of LEWIS H. DOUGLASS for admission or rejection into the Union would come up, had the effect of bringing together one of the largest representations of the compositors of this city ever congregated at one meeting. Two of the Committees on Nominations reported in favor of ten applicants, including DOUGLASS. As to the last named they said he had served a sufficient length of time at the business; that he gives satisfaction as a compositor; that he has a good character; is not a "rat," and that there is no reason except his race and color that should deprive him of becoming a member of the Typographical Union. Being, therefore, a fair man they recommended that he be admitted to membership in Columbia Typographical Union. A minority report was submitted, signed by the remaining member of the Committee. After stating the facts in the case, he says the plain requirements of the law of this Union and of the National Union are not to admit to membership a printer without card, who comes from a place where a Union exists, unless he brings from such Union a certificate satisfactorily explaining why he has none, and that the character DOUGLASS established for himself in Denver still attaches and does not lift him above the operation of the general law outside of which Union No. 101 cannot safely travel. A motion was made to lay the latter or minority report on the table. The vote was taken amid frequent interruption and great confusion, and resulted in yeas 229, nays 164. The announcement of the vote was received with applause, mingled with hisses. On motion the majority report was adopted amid enthusiastic cheering and confusion. The Union proceeded to vote seriatim upon the candidates proposed for admission, with the exception of LEWIS H. DOUGLASS. Three names having been balloted for and the candidates elected, the President was about to read the fourth when a motion to adjourn was made, and this prevailed amid great disorder and excitement.

THE RAM STONEWALL.

It will be remembered that in 1867 certain Japanese Commissioners, one TOMAGOW, and others, visited this country, making large purchases of American products. Among other things they bought of our Government the celebrated ram Stonewall for $400,000, paying $300,000 cash, and stipulating to pay the balance on the arrival of the ram in Japan. The State Department has recently received the final payment, and placed the same in the Treasury to the credit of the Navy Department. The rebellion in Japan caused a long delay in the delivery of the ram after her arrival in Japan. During this time the expenses of the vessel and crew, some $75,000, were borne and advanced by the State Department through the legation at Yeddo. This sum was promptly reimbursed by the Japanese Government, with interest. They also allowed interest on the balance of the purchase money from the date of transfer in Washington to the time of payment in Japan.

MISCELLANEOUS.

There are but few strangers in Washington, and, as a consequence, the hotels are almost empty.

The colored man, TURNER, appointed several weeks ago Postmaster of Macon, Ga., has not yet furnished his bond.

The thirty lady clerks to be employed in the Patent Office are to be examined, in regular form, as to their capacity for the work. There will be a lady superintendent of that department.

The residue of the estate is to be divided equally between his brothers, ALEXANDER H., ARTHUR W., THOMAS and ROSWELL ALLYN. TIMOTHY M. ALLYN is named as executor.

ANOTHER RAILROAD ACCIDENT.

An Extensive Smash-Up on the Erie Road.

An Engine and Fourteen Cars Thrown Into the Passaic River.

The Crashing of Timbers Heard Three Miles Off—Alleged Criminal Carelessness of an Engineer.

A fearful accident occurred at the Passaic bridge, on the New-York and Erie Railway, at 7:40 o'clock on Saturday evening, which, most miraculously, was attended without loss of life, though with considerable destruction to property. It appears that a Western-bound stock train, to which was attached engine No. 105, took the switch just previous to arriving at Passaic bridge. Next passed the lightning train, and following came No. 3 Paterson train. While the other two trains were passing, Mr. ROSS, Bridge Superintendent, was standing at the east end of the bridge, and as a schooner had been in waiting, his assistant commenced to turn off the upper or northern side of the bridge, when the freight train headed with engine No. 105 and twenty-five cars came thundering down. Mr. ROSS, who was on that side of the bridge, commenced to shout and threw his hat high up in the air, which attracted the attention of the engineer, RYAN, and as the engine came on to the bridge, he and the fireman jumped off. On sped the train, and over went the engine forty feet down; next came the tender, which, throwing a half somersault, struck her stern against the opposite abutment and there rested; finally came the empty cars, one after another, crushing and grinding, until fourteen of them had completely filled up the chasm, and the fifteenth, for want of space, was dropped into the track.

RYAN, the engineer, was a new man on this section of the road, and he and the fireman have shedaddled, under the belief that an employe had lost his life. At the time the locomotive went over the draw, a brakeman was on top of one of the freight cars; but he made a sudden break for the other two cars, and as the train went down, he leaped onward, and thus saved himself. Mr. TRENUNE, a merchant of Jersey City, who stood below, just in range, says that the noise was the most terrific he had ever heard; and by subsequent testimony it appeared that the crash was heard at Rockaway Park Hotel and below, three miles from the scene. Fortunately nobody was killed or even injured.

Thousands of people visited the scene yesterday. The Westward-bound drawbridge was smashed beyond repair. The Eastern-bound track was so far repaired that the Paterson train was passed over last night, and arrived here two hours late. The through train went upon Piermont, and from thence came down to Jersey City over the Northern Railroad.

A Pennsylvania Democratic Congressman on the Question of War with England.

From the Philadelphia Age, June 19.

The following letter from Judge WOODWARD was written to J. E. THOMPSON, Esq., in reply to a question propounded on international law, and published in the Wyoming Democrat:

WILKESBARRE, June 3, 1869.

J. E. Thompson, Esq.:

DEAR SIR: Your letter directs my attention to a question of international law, with which I profess no familiarity, but I am quite willing to state my impressions, and you will receive them for what they are worth.

Commercial nations always have property and debts with each other, and when war breaks out between them, it is a question rather of policy than of law, whether the enemy's property within our jurisdiction shall be confiscated. By the law of nations, the right of confiscation exists. But with us it can be exercised only in pursuance of a special act of Congress. An act merely declaring war does not authorize confiscation. Until a statute directly authorizing it be passed, the property of a British subject, (supposing we were at war with Great Britain,) would continue under the protection of our laws, and might be claimed at the close of hostilities. So would debts survive war unless expressly confiscated by an act of Congress. And no treaty would be necessary, in the absence of an express confiscation, to restore to the owner his property and liability for debts. This is my understanding of the manner in which we apply the abstract, actual right of confiscation to an enemy's goods and debts.

But why do you discuss the consequences of a war between us and England, since such an event is practically impossible? Men who speak the English language will never wage war any more as among themselves. Insurrections and outbreaks, no doubt, will occur now and then, but national wars among people of our lineage and language are improbabilities of so high a degree as to be, practically, impossible.

Such politicians as SUMNER and CHANDLER will always be crying out for war, just as ravens screech over battle-fields for carcasses on which to feed, but they represent not the heart, or life, or sense of the nation. And if ever the time of us should determine to fight England, she wouldn't fight us. She would pay all the damages of the Alabama and give us the Canadas to boot, rather than have a year's war with us. We are in the condition of two game cocks, one of whom is afraid, and the other dares not, and therefore each wears his gaffs and does his crowing without an encounter, and it will be so to the end. With the Latin races both we and England may have wars, when the principles of law to which I have referred would apply to the belligerents' property. But the future great wars will be between races descended of the Anglo-Saxon and the Romans, speaking different languages and breathing different climates.

I have no fears of war with England, and cannot therefore be much solicitude about such questions as you submit for my consideration.

Always happy to hear from you, I am your obedient servant,

GEORGE W. WOODWARD.

A Preacher Arrested on a Charge of Embezzlement and Fraud.

From the Buffalo Commercial Advertiser, June 19.

About three weeks since a man known as Rev. J. D. HARRIS, employed as a sub-agent by Mr. R. J. BALL, General Agent in this city for the Manhattan Life Insurance Company of New-York, to make collections through the country, called on Mr. BALL and made the following statement:

"I had in my possession about the sum of $1,500 in cash, money collected during the month of May on policies issued, insuring the lives of R. W. CHENEY, F. R. CHENEY, H. L. DOUGLAS, Yorkshire, Cattaraugus County, and others; said policies and renewals issued by the Manhattan Life Insurance Company, and sent me for collection. That said amount of money or thereabouts was placed by me in a hand-kerchief on the afternoon of Monday, the 31st of May, 1869, and secreted about my person; that I was at the time of placing the money about my person, boarding with one ELIN COOK, in Dunkirk, in Pike, Wyoming County; that I retired on the night of the 1st day of June in the customary manner, about 9 o'clock, and that shortly after retiring, I went to sleep, and have no further recollection until some time during the night I was awakened by some unusual noise, and say two men in my room, the light having been lighted; One of the men struck me unmercifully upon opening my eyes, turning upon me, and seized me by the throat with the right hand, and my left arm with his left; the other seized me by the right arm, and threw his weight upon my lower limbs, holding them with a vice-like grip, and proceeded to stuff my nostrils saturated with chloroform or ether, and to be chloroformed, which produced a helpless and languid state in which I looked on in the unconscious from its effects; that before becoming unconscious from its effects, I was conscious of being robbed of all the money in my possession, contained in the handkerchief, which was about my body, under my arms, the handkerchief having been cut and the money extracted therefrom.

When I became sensible I was lying in a helpless condition upon the bed, and remained in seemingly for a considerable length of time. As soon as I was enabled to move I rolled off the bed on the floor and attempted to articulate, but was unable to speak a word. I then arose and walked toward the door of my room, went out into the hall as far as the stairway, and called upon Mr. COOK, but have no recollection of him responding until I went down with the light, when I met him at or near the foot of the stairs. Shortly after word I returned to my room and dressed, when an examination was made in the premises, but without finding either the money or any trace of the robbers."

Not crediting the above story, and being convinced that Mr. HARRIS had not been robbed, Mr. BALL placed the matter in the hands of Messrs. ALBRO & BYERS, proprietors of the Central Detective Agency. They very soon became satisfied that Mr. HARRIS knew more of the pretended robbery than he was willing to disclose, and after getting a detailed statement from Mr. HARRIS of his transactions, Mr. ALBRO followed on his trail, and found that considerable portions of money claimed by him to have been lost at the time of the pretended robbery, and collected in the month of May, had actually been collected as long ago as January, February and March last.

Mr. HARRIS was arrested on Monday last at Batavia, on four separate charges for embezzlement. Yesterday he was examined on two of these charges before Justice COWDEN, of Batavia, and held to bail. The examination on the other two charges was postponed.

Another warrant is in the hands of an officer for Mr. HARRIS on a charge of embezzlement committed in Wyoming County at the time of the pretended robbery.

ALBANY, Sunday, June 20.

I regret much that engagements to-morrow, with persons coming from a distance, with whom I cannot now communicate, will deprive me of the pleasure of being present. I am very sorry. JOHN T. HOFFMAN.

The Press of the Country on Mr. Raymond as an Editor and a Public Man.

From the New-York Tribune (Biographical Sketch.)

In the great newspaper offices, in the Clubhouses, in Wall-street, in committee-rooms, in all places where men of culture and of affairs meet together, a little whisper of news came yesterday which awed the bravest and saddened the lightest hearts. It was only the sad tidings that told every day of some man well known to his fellows; only the news that a kindly face would be no more seen among them, a heartsome voice be no more heard, a firm step no longer ring down familiar ways. And yet few faces could be more missed than this one lying unnerved in such dreamless sleep; few voices be out of more listening ears, few steps fall whose coming had brought assurance of a friend's approach to a greater host of friends. Governor RAYMOND is dead, said the brief report. But no man who heard it repeated it in that form. "A great journalist is dead," said one voice: "An able politician is gone," said another. And so multitudes remembered him, each giving him honor for some distinctive power, but all adding in softer voice, "and he had no enemies." It is a good record to have left. A young man still, an over-worked, over-anxious, over-eager man, ambitious, liking position, liking money, liking all the prizes and all the warm, sweet gifts of life, in close relations with hundreds of men of most different capacities and purposes, he leaves no personal enemy, not one who shall say "he was a false friend." In his life there was much bitter speech about the politician, the officer, the legislator, the editor—none concerning the man. Now that he cannot explain ways that seemed unwise or tortuous, his bitterest detractors, touched by the sweet charity and wisdom which are the gift of Death when no journalist of equal ability and influence shall ever in the future less worthily devote the time and exert the other than he whom we are called now to lay in what men call his "untimely grave."

From the New-York Leader.

The last time (and it was only a few weeks since,) that the writer saw the late Mr. RAYMOND, the latter cautioned him against over-taxation of mental powers. The answer was good-humoredly made, "Physician, heal thyself;" and we parted to meet no more in this world.

There can be but little doubt that an over-working of the mental faculties caused the premature and sudden decease of the editor of the TIMES. He was the last person who, from physical appearance, one would have thought liable to the earthly fate that every Sunday some of us pray to be delivered from, in the beautiful service of the Anglican or the Catholic Church.

The details of Mr. RAYMOND's boyhood years and early New-England education we are familiar with. And also with the more special details of his career in this City, as the acknowledged editor of the Tribune and the Courier, and the TIMES from its commencement in 1851; or with the ministerial experience as a Whig and Republican politician, as the Speaker of the Assembly, as Lieutenant-Governor of this State, and as a member of Congress from the Fifth District.

The great world is prone to judge from the superficialities and traves of character that float on the surface of a man's life, and which it sees, with the magnanimity, generosity and kindly feelings of his nature it is not familiar, as its natural with combative men, who chafe against disliking influences, both in speech and pen, and vigorously, Mr. RAYMOND was a man of intense friendships. He was chary in giving his confidence, but when he did award them, they were lasting and were valued by those who received them. His admirables, of course, from his career as a journalist and politician, were numerous, but they were never vindictive; and beneath them all were strata of good-nature, philosophy, candor and common sense, which always had their effect.

In many respects he possessed a womanly nature. From the kindness and gentleness of his mind, it was easy superficially to deceive and humbug him. He would sometimes follow impulses without subjecting them to the crucible of the judgment. There was always a curious struggle between the affective and intellectual part of his nature. Some of his political mistakes, which the world may recall, were due to the fact that therein he followed rather these constructive impulse. He was not a thorough judge of human nature, which accounts for his often having been deceived or misled by associates and surrounding circumstances.

To a great majority of those who met him, thought that he was of a cynical and repellent disposition. He would sometimes assume that characteristic as a necessary shield, conscious as he often was of the liability of his generosities and magnanimities to lead him into error; but that disposition was assumed. To those who knew him in the moments when like a swordman he was off artificial guard, he was deservedly a great favorite. The phrase "little villain," which was applied to him in a moment of irritation by HORACE GREELEY, was as inappropriate as "demon" or "philosopher" often given to Mr. GREELEY. There was nothing "villainous" in the motive of the one, and there is nothing philosophical in the character of the other.

Mr. RAYMOND was a great orator—much more so than his extraordinary ability in thought, in felicity of illustration and originality of expression, shine in manner. But there has been times when his delivery (very much like that of Mr. EVARTS) has approached the limits of great eloquence. He was witty, sarcastic, humorous, caustic, epigrammatic, and rather sophistical, but always logically. He was a great reader and, possessing a tenacious memory, he turned the former to much account in public and in private life. In social intercourse his conversation was exceedingly entertaining. As a journalist he wrote just as he talked, and he talked as he recalled in controversy. With an odd reputation in some quarters for hypocrisy and scheming and caution, he scarcely exercised any of these qualities in talking or writing. But he was a good actor; and when he knew it was necessary to meet an opponent who was of the same school of diplomacy, he could cope with him or his own ground.

Mr. RAYMOND preserved to the last all his boyish instincts and feelings. Only last week we saw him, in crossing the Park, rest against a post for a moment and watch the boys, who, while the policeman had gone to his beat, were playing ball, and watching with all that delight expressed by his former antagonist, WILLIS, in the beautiful poem of "Saturday Afternoon."

"It will make my heart from its weariness
To see the young at play."

He was always as fond of all sports as the younger BENNETT is.

Had not Mr. RAYMOND allowed himself to be humbugged on the one hand by the friends of Judge BARDIN, and on the other hand to listen to the false appeal to his magnanimity by the friends of Mr. EVARTS, he would have been chosen in the Spring of 1861 to the United States Senate. But to his own newspaper we refer our readers for all details. Perhaps many wish to know of the life and death of the eminent American journalist.

From the New-York Express.

We deeply regret to hear of the death, from apoplexy, of HENRY J. RAYMOND, at his residence, in this City, at 8 o'clock this morning.

The news comes upon us so suddenly and unexpectedly that we can hardly realize it, and all the more, as twice within the week past we have had long business interviews with Mr. RAYMOND as one of the Executive Committee of the Associated Press. Up to last night his prospects of a long life seemed as good as those of any middle-aged man in the City. He was apparently in the best of health, and wrote as vigorously and conversed as freely as ever. Next week he was anticipating a trip to Detroit, and thereafter a week or two of relaxation at Saratoga. Recently rejoined to his family after their long absence in Europe, his domestic relations seemed as bright and promising as the heart of the most fond desire.

But God disposes, while man proposes, and in vain are all calculations founded upon the certainty of human life. Mr. RAYMOND died in the middle of his usefulness as a leading member of the New-York Press, and of a newspaper with which he has been connected for nearly thirty years. He was the founder of the NEW-YORK TIMES, which was started in September, 1851. In 1841 he was also assistant editor of the New-York Tribune, when the former was started in that year; and, from 1843 to 1851, he was one of the editors of the New-York Courier & Enquirer. He was elected to the State Legislature in 1849 and in 1850. In 1854 he was elected Lieutenant-Governor of the State, and was President of the Senate during the years 1855-56, with dignity and ability, as at a later period he presided over the Assembly. Indeed, few men better understood parliamentary law than himself, and very few have wielded a readier pen or stood higher as a ready debater. He was elected to the State Assembly for the third time in 1861, and made Speaker at the opening of the session of 1862, and the next Autumn he was elected to Congress, where his manly and independent stand against party cliques and leaders lost him the confidence of the extreme men of his party, and compelled him to forfeit his position as Chairman of the Republican National Committee. Mr. RAYMOND was not a Whig of the Gerard school, though an old friend of HENRY CLAY. WEBSTER also—who can hardly be called of the same school of politics. The speeches of the latter were often admirably reported by Mr. RAYMOND under a short-hand system of his own, and few have ever excelled Mr. RAYMOND in the quickness or accuracy of his reports of speeches and lectures or his sketches of men and events.

From Le Courrier Des Etats-Unis.

As a journalist Mr. RAYMOND was noted for tact and good breeding, for his respect for the opinions of others, and for a courteous method of expression, too easily possessed, unhappily, by the Press militant. Added to these qualities were a fresh and vigorous style and a right judgment that, having eyes for him from party waywardness often rendered him an object of suspicion to partisan leaders. He was ardent and impetuous in polemics, but the vivacity of his faith never caused him to forget the courtesy due his adversaries.

As a private citizen he was what an English word, in which our own tongue is defective, so fully expresses, a perfect gentleman. Erudite and polished he carried into society the same traits that distinguished him as a writer: urbanity, politeness and a gentle pride that was inclined toward the timid to greet and encourage them.

The journal he founded and of which he was the spirit, the TIMES, sustains by his demise a loss that will be long felt. It retains its excellent organization and a talented editorial corps. But the vigorous individuality of the departed Mr. RAYMOND, and of which his whole career, both as a politician and a journalist, bore the imprint, it will indeed be difficult to replace.

From the Evening Press.

In the death of Mr. RAYMOND the public suffer a peculiar and irreparable loss in being deprived of a journalist who was without a peer in the candor and fidelity with which he was wont to comment upon prominent men and political events. Probably no man now lives who holds the position, or possesses the authority of mind, which enabled Mr. RAYMOND to render the TIMES so valuable to every seeker of the true and more exalted springs of the political action of the day. He labored wisely and well to bring to the force of popular passion and prejudice, if it always easier to go with the current. But Mr. RAYMOND was fearless, and never hesitated to prick the bubbles of the day in his own straightforward, dignified way. We can ill afford, in no other life memory, to lose the strengthening and his example emulated.

From the Brooklyn Eagle.

The late HENRY J. RAYMOND, like him all in all, was probably the first of Journalists. And when we say this we of course imply that he was the first of American journalists. For the man who is alone at the head of his country journalism stands only in specialties or single features of journalistic excellence.

The journal which sustains the deserved and immediate tribute to the death of Mr. RAYMOND says:

From the Evening Press.

The last letter from Mr. RAYMOND's pen that appeared in any issue of the TIMES was that on Mr. EVARTS. It was pithy and very pointed.

The article referred to was an earnest defense of an old associate, against what the writer regarded as an unjust aspersion. It was the testimony with Mr. RAYMOND's generous character and good temper recognized alike by those who agreed with and those who differed from him in political opinion—that his final printed words were an expression of that personal fidelity to friends and companions which was habitual to him. No journalist was more positively respected by, and not one was more sympathetic with, journalists of every grade. Successively a worker in every department of newspaper effort, he fully understood the difficulties as well as the duties incident to each, and none of his coworkers ever failed of helpful appreciation. In the records of American journalism no name will have a brighter place than that of HENRY J. RAYMOND.

From the New-York Atlas.

The name of HENRY J. RAYMOND has been so prominently before the public, that even a reminder of his career is scarcely necessary. As member and Speaker of the New-York Assembly, Lieutenant-Governor and member of the United States House of Representatives, and in many political positions inseparable from such influence, he has uniformly manifested the most conservative spirit consistent with the rulings of a radical party, and something of that self-party vacillation which seems to be a part of true conservatism, the same quality being intensified by what he mistakenly designed to be his friend as his great capacity for feeling an earnest conviction. Of the amenities of public controversy, meanwhile, he was much more than usually careful; and as an editor, laborious, tasteful and thoroughly, he certainly ranked with many of the best newspapers in America. Taken in regards, and with at least only one very trivial exception, his death leaves a notable blank in journalism—a blank more difficult to fill than would be the corresponding withdrawal of any one of three or four other members of the same profession of the Metropolis. Intuitively more noisy and extended, but less healthy than fanaticism nor the earnestness which could have made and kept him a leader in a violent age, thank God for the fact, as we have quite answers of the injurious opposite. And to have built certainly such a journal as the TIMES, is a life work at the end of which no man can be said to have lived in vain or failed to serve his generation.

From the Albany Evening Journal.

Mr. RAYMOND was a ready and polished writer. His attacks were of the Damascus blade order, keenly incisive. He was rarely personal, and never degradingly so. His information was widely varied, and ever at his command. His method of presenting a subject was thorough and forcible, commanding respect even when failing to convince. Under his management, the TIMES had steadily increased in power as a reflex of public opinion, and in value as a disseminator of public intelligence.

Mr. RAYMOND was a member of the Whig Baltimore Convention of 1852, where he exercised a powerful influence on its stormy elements. In 1854 he was elected Lieutenant-Governor by the combined Whig, Free-Soil and Temperance parties. He took an active part in the formation of the Republican Party, and drew up the celebrated Pittsburg Address, one of the most eloquent, logical and conclusive arguments ever put forth to sustain the people in a war upon principle. He made a number of speeches on the stump, in the Fremont and subsequent campaigns, and was always a favorite with the thinking and earnest masses. At the close of his term as Lieutenant-Governor, he retired to returning from public life, but the voice of the people, in 1856, summoned him to the Legislature, in common with many other eminent spirits, met in the memorable Assembly of 1857, over which he presided with grace and impartiality as Speaker.

When Mr. RAYMOND embarked in the Philadelphia movement, he committed a political blunder which cost him the confidence of his party. At the time of his death, however, he was fast recovering his lost power, and gave every evidence of again becoming a leading and influential director of public movements. He recently resigned as Chairman of the Democratic Committee of New-York City, and was devoting himself, with skill and sagacity, to the work of strengthening the TIMES as a political and news journal, and of aiding the party he loved in securing useful and effective action.

Mr. RAYMOND was pleasant and affable. His sympathies were with human progress and moral reform. A brilliant, able and influential career has prematurely ended. He died suddenly gone down at high noon.

From the Syracuse Journal.

Mr. RAYMOND was most widely known and esteemed as a journalist. He enjoyed a justly high reputation for his literary attainments, which, however, were seldom displayed outside his newspaper. He was the author of a number of literary addresses and orations on public occasions. His only printed volume, we believe, was a History of the Administration of President Pierce, issued in 1864. His ambition was political, in the direction of which he was a founder and controller, and which he succeeded in establishing upon a firm basis as one of the leading journals of the country. His political course was not always in accord with the views and wishes of the great body of the party with which he labored, but his abilities and services are acknowledged by all. Mr. RAYMOND was an accomplished gentleman, and possessed strong social qualities. He held the regard of many warm and devoted friends. His death, in the prime of life, with the power and opportunity for a career of usefulness before him, will be widely regretted.

From the Union Herald.

In the death of Hon. HENRY J. RAYMOND, editor of the NEW-YORK TIMES, which occurred suddenly yesterday morning at 8 o'clock, American journalism lost one of the architects of its present greatness, and one of its brightest ornaments. * * * A great newspaper is a great power, and no man wields a more direct or healthy influence upon it than the editor who moulds the opinions and the legislation of his vicinity. Grant that the writings by which he accomplishes results are read to-day and forgotten to-morrow. The results are his writings also, engraved in society and institutions and impelling events forward with the force of a resistless tide of printed pages. Mr. RAYMOND was not an original Abolitionist, but he helped in the destruction of slavery. In the war for the Union, he aided it not in leading opinion, in consolidating it. For a worthy culture and a generous manhood, he has contributed largely to the intellectual wealth of the country. He drops suddenly in mid career. All the prime of manhood were in his hands. Hardly at the summit of his prime, not yet 50 years of age—he was born Jan. 24, 1820—what capabilities of work were yet in him! How nearly he had reached the goal of public functions; how many editorial articles rich in fact and illustration and logic; how many essays eloquent and brilliant and classical, adequate any one to make the reputation of a magistrate or even a historian; how much of sage statement of a wide and varied experience; those chill, silent fingers were ready to write, as that active and overwrought brain was teeming with them! And who shall say what respect, after friendship in the era of peace lay open for him who, if he erred in the time of war, erred from excess of charity and moderation? In his own paper and in the journalism of the metropolis and of the country, the loss of Mr. HENRY J. RAYMOND leaves a vacancy which no living man can altogether fill.

From the Watertown (N. Y.) Reformer.

We have never been more surprised by the announcement of the death of a public man than we were in reading in our afternoon dispatches of yesterday the sudden decease of HENRY J. RAYMOND, editor of the NEW-YORK TIMES. In the field of journalism, Mr. RAYMOND had no superior in this country, nor in the world. As a rapid, fluent and elegant writer, he was without an equal, and his brilliant success in establishing the TIMES on a firm and solvent basis proved his full appreciation of the requirements, the ability and responsibility of his profession.

After his Congressional term he publicly announced all ambition for office, and devoted himself uninterruptedly to the only business in which his heart was in happy union with his head. Mr. RAYMOND was singularly affable and winning in his manners, and was a favorite in the society in which he moved. We saw him last at the Dickens Dinner, at which he made the most sparkling speech of the evening, and he seemed then in good health. Number of his years and the full maturity of his powers. In less than fourteen months he is suddenly called to another world, but the influence which he has exerted on the thought, the civilization of his country, will live for generations yet to come.

He died in the prime of life, at the age of 49 years, and had good reason to expect the best decade to be the most useful period of his life; but death has stricken him down in the very zenith of his reputation, unfortunately, it would seem to the public, but to him who orders all things well, it may appear that his work was wholly done.

From the Springfield Republican.

All things considered, we regard Mr. RAYMOND as the most thorough journalist of his time. This is, probably, not generally conceded, perhaps not widely thought of. The reason why he did not demonstrate it more fully was his constant yielding to the temptations of political life. He saw and often admitted the error of this; but said he could not help it. There was nothing so fascinating to him, he said, as parliamentary debate in a deliberative assembly—in the Legislature at Albany, or in the Congress at Washington. But the two times were incompatible with one another. The very quality that made him a political journalist was the highest—that of independence of thought and a capacity for seeing both sides of a question—was a drawback to him as a politician. Independence and candor have come to be the essential requisites of a first-class journalist, but they cannot be freely indulged in by a sidetrack politician. While they are the strength of a popular journal, they are the weakness of a party man. What a good journalism is often very bad politics. And Mr. RAYMOND's constitutional incapacity for a successful party man was one of the odd elements of his character, and of his discomfiture. And what was worst and weakest in his paper grew out of his attempts to reconcile the conflicts of his double position.

Mr. RAYMOND was in no sense a reformer, as Mr. GREELEY eminently is; but he was not without convictions, and he was a thorough, even radical, thinker in their advocacy. His party friends have not often done him justice in this respect. He held firmly to results and conclusions; but he was patient and flexible in the means by which they should be reached; and his relations with such politics with Mr. WEED and Mr. SEWARD and others, of that way of thinking, aggravated into a weakness, possibly, this characteristic of his temperament. Had he kept aloof from all these politicians, and out of the entanglements and responsibilities of political life, keeping true and fast to his ideal of journalism—than which no man had a clearer or a truer one—his career, and that of his paper, while they would not have been wholly and always consistent with themselves, would still most likely, have been free from those conspicuous changes that have sometimes confused their friends and brought ridicule from their enemies.

Mr. RAYMOND was a very interesting and attractive man in personal intercourse. His nature was not warm and overflowing; but still it had strong currents and a hearty tone. At most he seemed cold, distant and abstracted to others who did not could be more friendly, more sympathetic. He was too frank for a thoroughly polish man, too well balanced in heart and mind for a bad one. He was free, fresh, strong and engaging in conversation; he was tasteful and courteous in expression, both in his personal and professional intercourse. He seemed has been there, by precept and example, than the TIMES, to remove coarse and disagreeable personalities from the pages of the American Press; and though he was cautious and conservative by nature, "thundering orthodox," as GREELEY called it, he had no horror of innovation, and was a genuine hearty friend of reform and progress.

To us, he was one of the most interesting men of America; and we cannot but feel that he has secured that degree of appreciation and respect—confessedly wide as to him which he has worked which was his due; his life of that way; in New-York, in journalism, he will stand out conspicuous and honored. His life is one of the monuments of its progress; his death is one of the warnings of its exhausting and ingrossing labors.

From the Boston Post.

Mr. RAYMOND was one of the ablest journalists this country ever produced. He commenced his public career as a reporter for the New-York Tribune, but was soon induced to accept a position as chief writing editor on the Courier & Enquirer. He rapidly became one of the prominent leaders of the anti-slavery wing of the old Whig Party, and was made Speaker of the Assembly and subsequently Lieutenant-Governor. In 1856 he was complimented with an election to Congress, which he declined. Subsequently Mr. RAYMOND aspired to be an independent journalist, and therefore studied how he might cut loose from party bribes. In private life he was justly esteemed, and his loss deprives the profession of one who adorned and dignified his position as a journalist by his industry, his talents, and those gentlemanly traits which distinguished him in his private and social relations.

From the Burlington (Vt.) Free Press.

Mr. RAYMOND's Congressional career has been severely criticised, but the verdict of history will be that it was one actuated by purely patriotic motives and whose error was not of being vacillating, but of being too logically consistent. Since he left Congress he has devoted himself almost entirely to his paper. Some months since he was elected Chairman of one of the opposing organizations of the Republican Party in New-York City, but resigned in a short time ago, because his wishes and influence in the conflicting elements in the party were not seconded by others. In 1850 he was elected a member of the Corporation of the University of Vermont. He was for a number of years President of the Associate Alumni of that institution, and has always been a firm friend of the institution.

Mr. RAYMOND wrote some literary addresses which were published, and a life of ABRAHAM LINCOLN, which was in many respects the best that has been written, and will always be a valuable work. He also edited the works of LINCOLN's State papers and other writings and speeches. His chief literary labors, however, were bestowed upon his paper, and its editorial columns oftentimes were almost wholly filled with the fruits of his clear brain and rapid pen. He was a great gifts as an editor, and his death will be felt by a large circle of fraternity throughout the country. To us that loss is deepened and intensified by a long personal friendship. We have written a few dry details of his life, but all the while our thoughts have been busy with memories of kindly words and deeds, which cannot be uttered, but will never be forgotten. There are many among our citizens who will also feel his death as a personal loss.

From the Portland (Me.) Advertiser.

Mr. RAYMOND was an excellent reporter and made his mark on the Tribune by reporting with extraordinary accuracy and fullness the popular scientific lectures of Dr. LARDNER. His reports were afterward published in two volumes. The fidelity, impartiality and capacity for hard work, which were invaluable qualifications of the reporter, afterward marked the editor. The TIMES under his management has been the most faithful, accurate and impartial mirror of contemporary history among the great dailies. Its opinions have not always been wise, but they have been calmly formed and temperately expressed, and what is of chief importance, its statements of facts were true. If at times misled himself, he has never misled his readers by withholding or adding to the simple truths of current history. The TIMES is his proper monument, and will long remain a memorial of a patient, unostentatious, manly life, worthy of admiration and imitation.

From the Hartford Courant.

The death of Mr. RAYMOND is a loss in so many ways that to speak of all of them would be to write at great length. His great and intelligent intellectual activity called him into many fields, so that he had become an actual power in the country individually and not by reason of any official position. To say that he is dead is to say a place is vacant which cannot easily be filled. In his ordinary ability is conceded by all. His political career has been often criticised; he has sometimes refrained from speaking when many thought he ought not to be silent, and he has been free with his strictures when many thought them ill-timed. But we have been accustomed to think, especially of late years, that his steady aim was independent journalism and the pursuit in public affairs of a moderate and what is generally understood to be a sensible course. And there is no party that is not proud of the reputation of its editor. It is of the loss to the journalism of the country in the death of Mr. RAYMOND that we think first. In varied ability and accomplishments, in adaptability and capacity for work, and in the intelligent perception and sagacity which is as much a quality of the journalist as of the lawyer, no one in the profession was better fitted for it than Mr. RAYMOND, and no one had a juster sense of its dignity, and importance, or has done more by his example to vindicate them. When we remember what the Press of the country was twenty years ago, and see what it is to-day, we cannot forget that Mr. RAYMOND has contributed as much as any man, to its elevation. If he had never done any other service to the country, this one thing would be sufficient to keep him long in grateful remembrance. It is for those who knew him best to make an adequate estimate of his abilities and an analysis of his character; in this brief notice we only wish to bear our testimony to his conspicuous merit as an editor, in most respects in the front rank of the profession at home and abroad, and to express our profound sorrow at his sudden death.

From the Hartford Post.

Mr. RAYMOND's death is a great loss to journalism in this country. He has done much to dignify and ennoble it by infusing into the profession a manliness and independence it had not had before, making it something more than the mere echo of public opinion, giving it instead the influence and power to which independent thinking and honest and able discussion of facts entitled it, and thus elevating the tone of the Press generally bringing the results thereof into the conduct of his own paper, whence they radiated, affecting, in greater or less degree, the whole Press of the country. His political course has been largely criticised and sometimes condemned at times; and always most severely by men with whom his political affiliations were. For it is one of the misfortunes of our politics that parties come to think they own the newspapers that support them, and that their editors belong to them, body and soul, and political parties for this treason to be any part of thinking citizens of the regular platform channel.

Mr. RAYMOND has been censured as a "trimmer." Well, he may not always have been right. He made his mistakes. But his influence upon the country, and the Press, was always on the side of the right, and he was honest, honorable and, if he in the light of a good calmly that we consider his best, at the time, to a mechanism he was doing so much to elevate.

From the New-Haven Palladium.

By the death of Hon. HENRY J. RAYMOND American journalism loses one of its foremost editors. He brought to the profession of his choice peculiar qualifications such as are rarely combined. Though possessing ability of the most brilliant order, his industry was untiring, and he performed feats of hard work such as have seldom, if ever, been equaled. But Mr. RAYMOND was just alone as any other editor and one of the most accomplished debaters in the country, with a clearness and power of statement which at one time promised to lead him to high political distinction; he was also, as a journalist, a man of high principle. The NEW-YORK TIMES, with which his name will always be associated, and of which he was the creator, inaugurated a new era in American journalism. It has always been able, dignified, and never descended to the low personalities which characterized too many of its leading cotemporaries of New-York. In all his relations with his brother journalists Mr. RAYMOND was honorable and genial, and by all those who knew him or were associated with him in his editorial work, his loss will be felt as that of a kind and sincere friend.

From the Norwich Bulletin.

The telegraph announces the sudden death yesterday of Hon. HENRY J. RAYMOND, the well-known editor of the NEW-YORK TIMES. Mr. RAYMOND was in the prime of his life, being only forty years old, and yet he had reached the position of one of the foremost journalists of the country, in many respects the foremost. Under his directing, a model journal. It has had at all times furnished strong meat enough for political items, and yet some of the most vigorous articles on matters of public interest that have been published anywhere in the country have appeared in its columns. Its contents have been marked by vigor, elegance, intellectual force and literary taste and ability—all of which characteristics were Mr. RAYMOND's own. In his political career Mr. RAYMOND has been often assailed with charges of inconsistency, and of a lack of what is called backbone. Yet these charges were, in great measure, unfounded. His political doctrines were of the moderate sort, agreeing as little with those of extreme men on the one side as on the other, but they were quite as consistent with themselves as is the majority of public men. During the rebellion Mr. RAYMOND was one of the warmest and unflinching and most hopeful supporters of the Government, and his influence, exercised both with voice and pen, was at all times patriotic and reassuring. His literary monument is the TIMES, which he established in 1851, and which has been one of the great successes of New-York journalism.

From the Providence Journal.

A great journalist has died. HENRY J. RAYMOND leaves few equals, on either continent, in the department to which he had devoted his life. Of vigorous and versatile intellect, highly accomplished, with immense capacity for labor, Mr. RAYMOND united the greatest qualities for the profession in which he attained eminent success. Mr. RAYMOND was eminent not only as a writer, but as a speaker, and independently of his connection with the Press, was an active politician. He was a man of most laborious habits, and doubtless, in after life, taxed his brain, in the manner which called forth the remonstrances of Mr. GREELEY. His sudden death has cast over New-York a pall, which the other cities of the country will sympathize, and leaves in American journalism a void that will long remain unfilled.

From the Newark Advertiser.

The sad and sudden death of HENRY J. RAYMOND is an event which calls for more than usual comment. It is hard to add anything to the nobly just and generous analysis of his character which Mr. GREELEY gives in the Tribune of this morning. Yet Mr. RAYMOND's character is to be studied in two different aspects. As a politician he was a Seward Whig originally, an opponent of the compromise measure of 1850, an early Republican, and the author of that memorable "Address to the People," with which the Pittsburg Convention of 1856 announced the nomination of General FREMONT; a steadfast and influential advocate of Republican principles in the hard four years' struggle that ended in the election of ABRAHAM LINCOLN, a firm friend of the Union during the war, and after it a conciliator of the South, sacrificing much of personal popularity and of success as a journalist; and as we think now, and thought then, unwisely. The Philadelphia Convention of 1866 was the central point in RAYMOND's political life. We recollect with emotion now, as we saw with borrow at the time, his small but compact figure on the platform of that vast hall, while he read the Address of which he was the author, his clear-ringing voice, and admirable intonation giving force to every sentence.

It was in RAYMOND's kindly nature to commit that error. He was a patriot; but he abhorred the bloodshed of the war. A progressive man—a radical in his convictions—he waited for time and opportunity. He doubted, somewhat, the general intelligence and firmness of the masses. He relied, perhaps, too largely on the existence of a cautious class of good men, reformers in essence yet with no disposition to be martyrs. To them he addressed himself. The TIMES, in all its course, has made its appeal to moderate men. No political party is a unit. All have their advanced and progressive ability to continually lifting them forward. Next comes the steady average, the great mass who follow leadership; but in the rear of all such columns is a balance of power, which may work one day for progress and another for retrogression, prudent, thoughtful, doubtful whether the hour has come to move.

Of this class, RAYMOND was the leader; but he led them with and not against the Republican Party. His nature made him cautious; but he was never cowardly. The political campaign of 1868 tested this thoroughly. He thought—and he was a sagacious observer of the Government—the time for a full and frank reconstruction between North and South had arrived. He mistook not himself, but the quality of those with whom he was ready to strike hands. He sacrificed a great political opportunity, fought out the battle with infinite pluck and endurance, and then when the game was up he yielded to the situation, and took his place quietly and usefully in the Republican ranks. Differing with him throughout the exciting contest, sure that he was in error, we never hesitated in our confidence in his ability to persuade.

But it is as a journalist that RAYMOND won his highest success. After the mortification which followed the defeat of the Philadelphia movement in 1866, he went for a time to Europe. Returning he found that between his absorption in politics and his absence in Europe, the TIMES, the really grand achievement of his life, had fallen off in merit and in general reputation. We saw him a few weeks later. His return had given a new impetus to everything. All traces of laziness among his subordinates had disappeared. He had called relative features presented in the editorial columns. Life and good-nature pervaded them; and he said to us with a tone that was genuine that he was back in the right place and happy in it. It was as an editor—not merely as a writer—that he excelled. He was a man of department of editorial life in which he did not excel. Industriously educated and well read in history, a student of affairs who better deserved the name of statesman than many of higher rank in public estimation, a lover of good books, and withal a clear thinker and effective writer, he was an accomplished component of "Great Journal." But was a reporter of distinguished skill, and a manager of great ability. He knew how to build up and correlate the forces of a great establishment. There was no department of journalistic labor to which he was not competent. He could frame the policy of such a journal, direct its course, and criticise the style of a petty local paragraph.

GREELEY is a great writer, but not altogether a great editor. His articles are infused with his own personality. His individual soul breathes in them. They are full of strong, impetuous expressions, which carry with them a conviction of the sincerity of the writer, but are always in his skill as an advocate. But Mr. RAYMOND worked upon a different principle. He did not force, but coaxed public opinion. His convictions were solid, but he was not always ready to assert them. He had the soft answer that turneth away wrath. His conciliatory nature was repelled. In his later years, allying himself with the conservative sentiment of the Republican Party, he was always ready to denounce "radicalism," and always ready to show conservatives why they should cast their votes with the radical element. It was with "if" only we have said before, a question of time and opportunity. He was the sincere friend of all reform and progress, but not the man to make himself a martyr for, the sake of being the hero of the occasion. He had but little of egotism. The prominence he assumed upon the platform and in the forum was rather the result of his ready talent as a public speaker than of any ambition for the reputation of eloquence. Perhaps the happiest time in his life was when he got comfortably back to his desk in the TIMES office, after his political defeat. He went heartily and cheerfully to work. The vinegar of disappointment was not poured into the public journals of this City, whose editors have failed in the forum, or before the people, had no place in the columns of the TIMES. They were kindly and genial as ever.

From the Pittsburg (Penn.) Chronicle.

The disputes indicate the universal sense of a great loss that has been sustained in the death of HENRY J. RAYMOND. We have already given expression to our feelings on this subject, but we desire to call attention to certain features of Mr. RAYMOND's character as a journalist. It must have been generally observed that, identified as the deceased editor was with the Republican Party, he was not a partisan in the invidious sense of that term. He had the courage, the frankness and the honesty to state, by broad general principles and advocate fair dealing in opposition to pure party tactics. He loved his country better than party, and whenever unscrupulous men, in order to achieve certain political successes, evinced a disposition to overrule law and equity disagreeable to win the day, Mr. RAYMOND was ever the first and boldest to protest, to warn, to appeal in behalf of justice and a straight forward course. He has sometimes been charged with being an unsteady man, and Mr. GREELEY has been romantically depicted as the honest, rough hewn, blunt, and fearless of truth at all hazards. The fact is that Mr. GREELEY has been generally ready to swallow anything and compromise anything, (except his convictions on the slavery question,) to keep his party in power; whilst Mr. RAYMOND, omitting one error, as Philadelphia, which was prompted by the honest motive, was consistently and inflexibly wedded to the right without reference at all to party considerations.

HENRY J. RAYMOND did more than any other individual in the United States to keep the Republican organization pure, cultivated, liberal and fair. He believed it to be the embodiment of the best intelligence, the safest judgment and the soundest morality in the country, and with this conviction ever in view, he shunned the thought of his ideal being dimmed or stained. His soul revolted at the intrigues of scheming demagogues. He was a genuine believer in above-board dealing. When he found a Cleon or Therites in the Republican ranks, he did not feel it incumbent on him to represent Cleon as a spotless patriot, and Therites as an unquestioned hero. In the respect Mr. GODKIN, of the Nation, most resembles RAYMOND. He, too, has done much for journalism by trampling down all those deceitful pretensions by which demagogues and brazen-faced knaves endeavor, with the aid of a powerful party, to foist themselves permanently upon the people as their legitimate representatives and leaders.

Every essential feature of Mr. RAYMOND's paper must have united with whole-hearted and steady purpose, since the close of the war, to endear and deserved to bring about a genuine reunion of the States on a fraternal basis. The idea which inspired his labors was that a stable reconciliation could only be effected by satisfactory that its foundation must be built on moral sentiments. In carrying out this most worthy idea, Mr. RAYMOND was compelled to endure much aspersion and misrepresentation. These were, people who called him, "a trimmer," and who accused him of a timidity which charged him with trying to hook up the newly-with which he professed to act. The World would employ its ingenuity to detect him in contradictions. The Herald would sneer at him for weakness. The Tribune would sharply denounce him for the audacity of daring to find fault with any measure or policy bearing the imprint of the party leaders. But in the midst of such sneers and downright abuse, Mr. RAYMOND kept on in the even tenor of his way, persuading his countrymen by logic, eloquence, lucid reasoning and a fair liberal and temperate tone, to look further ahead than immediate party triumph, and build their new union upon a fraternal basis and with some regard to constitutional landmarks. We have not to go any further than the State of Tennessee to discover how sound his views were in reference to the impossibility of successfully carrying out a proscriptive policy, and how very essential it was to abandon the thought of treating the Southern people for all time as rebels.

There is a consideration, too, which enhances the loss felt in Mr. RAYMOND's death. In his capacity as a journalist he did much to improve the taste of our people. The tone of his paper was pure. He did not encourage that spirit too common among our very conventional editors, to say in moments of exasperation harsher things that are warranted by truth. That is a crying sin among us. It seems to be the national motto, "anything to win." Years ago, HENRY CLAY lost the vote of Pennsylvania because his opponent was represented as a better protective tariff man. That was regarded as sharp and legitimate. In similar spirit many of our journalists, infected with the contagion of the politicians, seem to deem it perfectly right to prevail by misrepresentation, by perversion, sophistries, bitter taunts, and too often by falsehoods. RAYMOND scorned in his heart of hearts such degradation. He held up as a mirror before us all a paper which could deal with the most exciting topics without compromising its character for courtesy, fairness and honest argument. He proved that in the investigation of political subjects the philosophic spirit was not out of place. There was no kid-glovism in his clear, manly and temperate expositions, but there was always an atmosphere of high breeding, correct taste, deliberate thought, and, above all, frankness and intellectual charity.

Who shall fill the vacant chair? Who shall keep the best American newspaper still unspotted? Who shall make it in the future, as it has been in the past, a guide and counselor for statesmen and a welcome visitor to the inner circles of home? That inquiry is yet to be answered. Meanwhile, let us drop a tear and cast a wreath on the spot where will shortly lie, at peace from all his labors, a good and true man, whose life was spent in the beautiful effort of making his countrymen a wise, pure, liberal, and honest, as well as a great and powerful people.

From the Philadelphia Press.

This morning we make the announcement of the sudden death of Mr. HENRY J. RAYMOND, founder and conductor of the NEW-YORK TIMES. The unexpectedness of this event intensifies the regret it occasions. Mr. RAYMOND was a man of fine ability, and possessed powers of application which were unusual. In a literary point of view he was a strong writer, and he made his paper a journal readable and popular. Politically he was successful, yet unfortunate. Up to a certain standard he possessed boldness and vim, and his opinions obtained great weight. But when the arena became vast, when great practical aggressive issues were to be presented and handled, he either feared their contact or lacked the comprehension necessary to secure their success. He had all the elements of attaining popularity, and the cultivation of these led him into these erratic channels which obscured his fame and finally, when he destroyed the hopes of so many who trusted to the purity of his Republicanism. His journal was founded on the belief that conservatism was a necessity. He was shrewd enough to suspect that while his object would bring popularity, it might not prove remunerative, and that while it would succeed, it might not bring fortune. Around the blank of its politics he therefore threw a cordon of news attractions, and the result was amply remunerative.

Had he been spared, Mr. RAYMOND could never have been a leader in the higher fields of politics. He was not a trifling flaw-picker, nor a carper; nor by any means a temporizer. His convictions were earnest, his discussions generous, and where he failed to inspire he always commanded respect. He filled the sphere for which he was destined, and his success in life, in the face of fords an impressive lesson to American youth, in that it shows how perseverance and industry overcome all obstacles to success, and are the sure precursors of fame and fortune.

From the Philadelphia Post.

Personally, Mr. RAYMOND was a man universally liked, urbane, accomplished and kind. His relations with the staff of the TIMES were always pleasant, and he had the reputation in New-York of being liberal and just to all persons in his employ. As a politician, he was extremely shrewd and energetic, and on the night of his death was endeavoring to unite the divided Republican Party of New-York City. He was a man of strong impulses, but frequently took an erratic and doubtful course. He unfortunately joined the Johnson movement in 1866, and lost his place on the Republican National Committee. Recently he returned to the party, and did good service in many ways. He was an energetic, brilliant, hard-working journalism loses in him one of its ablest representatives.

From the Baltimore American.

Mr. RAYMOND was eminent among those men who have made their mark upon the time in which they lived as journalists. It is true, that he was also a politician, and in that capacity was elected to important trusts, but it was as the editor of a leading paper, rather than as a State legislator or a congressman, that he won the highest honors of a life of considerable usefulness and distinction. In the latter capacity he showed too much vacillation of purpose; was often disposed to gratify his private animosities at the expense of his party, and finally, by his action in connection with his affiliation with the Philadelphia Johnsonian Convention, greatly weakened the confidence of the Republican Party in his political discretion, if not in his fidelity to principle. But as an editor Mr. RAYMOND had few equals. He was a rapid thinker, a fluent writer, and could, at will, take up any subject of current interest, and treat it in a manner to attract the attention of the reader. The amount of editorial labor he was able to perform within a given time was immense, and in the early days of the TIMES it is said he often very literally filled the office of compositor, as the work of twenty-four hours. Having a thorough training as a newspaper man, he was, in the earlier days of reporting, one of the best reporters, and DANIEL WEBSTER is known to have always preferred him as the reporter of his great speeches

ALLEGED MALPRACTICE

A Man Dies of Poison Given by a Physician—Dr. Amand Involved in the Matter.

A very singular and mysterious case of death from poison came to the notice of Coroner KEENAN yesterday. It appears that on Saturday night JAMES STRAFFE, of No. 416 Seventh-avenue, a native of Ireland, aged 22, was admitted to Bellevue Hospital, suffering from the effects of some sort of poison, and death occurred at an early hour yesterday evening. Soon after his admission to the institution Coroner KEENAN was summoned to take the patient's ante-mortem examination, when he ascertained from STRAFFE that having suffered for some time with a disease of a private nature, he had consulted DR. (?) DESIRE AMAND, of No. 143 Bleecker-street, who prepared a mixture for him, and forthwith administered a dose of the same. At a later hour on Saturday STRAFFE called on another physician in Thirty-second-street for medicine which would relieve him of a terrible pain and burning sensation in the stomach. This latter physician gave him a prescription which he had made up at a drug-gist's at the corner of Seventh-avenue and Thirty-second-street. The unfortunate man swallowed the second mixture, when vomiting ensued almost immediately, and prostrated him so much that the druggist had him removed to Bellevue Hospital, where a portion of the mat-ter thrown off by STRAFFE was analyzed, and found to contain a quantity of "Sheel's green," a preparation of Paris green, and a virulent poison. These facts were learned by the Coroner from the druggist, having noticed somewhat from the effects of the poison-ous mixture, and was considered out of danger by the House Surgeon. A few hours after, however, convulsions set in, and finally resulted in death. Coroner KEENAN intends making a thorough investigation, and has placed a war-rant in the hands of Captain JOURDAN, of the Sixth Ward, for the arrest of Dr. AMAND.

ROBBED ON THE CARS.

Mr. Moritz Eberhardt, of No. 606 Sixth-street, while sitting on a Second-avenue car on Saturday, was suddenly assaulted by James Hyland and three other men, who robbed him of a silver watch and gold breastpin, and handed the plunder to a confederate, who escaped. When Hyland was brought before the Magistrate, he was fully committed to trial without bail.

GRAND LARCENY.

Daniel Curry, of No. 307 West Thirteenth-street, gave his stable boy to Charles Warnock, on Saturday, to do some work, and the latter left with a horse belonging to Mr. Curry subsequently discovered that the horse, which he had carelessly left in a vest hanging in the stable, had been stolen, and as Warnock was the only one who had access to the premises, he was arrested. The Magistrate held him for trial in default of bail.

CONSPIRACY TO DEFRAUD.

A few days ago Lawrence S. Benson, of No. 129 Adams-street, Brooklyn, noticed an advertisement in one of the morning journals calling for a partner in a Nickel and Gray business, with $600 capital. Being an invalid, Mr. Benson called at No. 478 Broadway, and there met Thomas J. Taylor and Benjamin R. Hicks, who admitted that they had inserted the advertisement and explained that they wished a partner in their business as proprietors of it in Brooklyn office. As these men stated that the new partner would receive a profit from the concern of nearly $60 per week, the necessary agreement was drawn up and the money was paid by Benson. Subsequently he found the business proved a non-paying one; in fact, there was no business; so Taylor and Hicks were arrested on Saturday and arraigned yesterday before the Magistrate, who held them in $1,000 each for the General Sessions.

Yorkville—Kilby, Justice.

ATTEMPTED RAPE.

The prisoner had a picnic on Saturday at Union Park, at the foot of Sixty-third-street, when several members of the association detected David Mahoney, aged 19, in the act of violating the person of Mary Day, aged 9 years. Mahoney was forthwith arrested and, on being brought before Justice KILBY, he was remanded for further examination.

NEWS OF THE DAY.

EUROPE.

Marshal SERRANO, yesterday, took the oath of office as Regent of Spain. In his address on the occasion he promised to respect the Constitution and the liberties of the Spanish people.

A partisan of the Ex-Queen, General PEZUELA, has been arrested, and will probably be exiled to the Canaries. A conspiracy in favor of ISABELLA has been discovered in Granada.

The Great Eastern has gone to Brest, France, from which port she will shortly sail on her cable-laying expedition.

Marshal SERRANO's new Cabinet is announced as follows: PRIM, War and President of the Ministry; SILVELA, Secretary of State; HERRERA GRACE, Justice. The new Ministers were presented to the Cortes on Saturday, on which occasion PRIM said the Government would observe all the provisions of the Constitution, and would exact equal respect for them from the nation.

The resolutions offered in the Cortes, condemning the presence of the Duke DE MONTPENSIER in Spain, have been rejected. PRIM opposed them, arguing that the Duke had a right to dwell in any part of the country. But the Republicans have determined to force the Duc de MONTPENSIER to quit Spain.

Of the thousand prisoners who were arrested in France during the recent election troubles, eight hundred have been discharged, and two hundred are still kept in confinement. In Paris the funeral of the rioters who were killed was largely attended, but there was no disorder.

In the House of Lords the Irish Church bill was under discussion until 4 o'clock on Saturday morning, when it was passed to a second reading amid great excitement. The Prince of WALES and the Duke of CAMBRIDGE were among the crowd of spectators in the galleries. The Times declares this to be a triumph for the power of public opinion, and the machinery of the Constitution.

The House of Commons has virtually rejected the new commercial treaty with France.

The King of Greece on Saturday opened the sessions of the New Chambers with a speech, in which he said it was the intention of the nation to fulfill all monetary obligations, and therefore a further development of her resources was desirable. With this object he proposed the cutting of a ship canal through the Isthmus of Corinth.

AUSTRALIA.

A number of members of the Colonial Parliament have been expelled for alleged bribery; but the people do not appear to believe the charges and have reflected them.

GENERAL.

Political matters seem to be again awaking considerable interest throughout the State of Virginia. The contest in the ensuing elections promises to be very lively and interesting.

The case of LEWIS H. DOUGLASS, the colored printer in the Government Printing Office at Washington, again came up before Typographical Union No. 101 of that city, on Saturday night. A majority of the Committee on Nominations reported in favor of admitting him to the Union, and a minority against. Amid a good deal of confusion the minority report was laid on the table, and the meeting adjourned without acting on the other.

A Mme. KENTON, one of the riders in Robinson's Circus, exhibiting in Allegheny, Penn., met with quite a serious accident on Friday. She was about jumping through one of the paper hoops, when her clothing caught on the hoop and she was thrown violently to the ground, striking on her head and breast. She was quite painfully injured, and had to be carried from the ring.

General LOGAN has addressed a long letter to the Secretary of War, urging the complete carrying out of the improvements proposed in the Illinois River.

The Boston Peace Jubilee closed on Saturday with the concert by the children of the public schools. The closing piece was "Old Hundred," and was sung by the audience and children together. After the concert, the members of the orchestra presented Mr. GILMORE with a gold watch and chain.

Reports from various parts of California have been received of the rapid progress of rust in wheat and barley crops. The damage is most considerable in the coast counties, where heavy fogs have prevailed for weeks past. Although the accounts represent that the rust is not general, the mischief is more serious than anticipated.

The steamship Great Republic, from Hong KONG, May 12, and Yokohama, 26th, arrived at San Francisco yesterday. She brought a number of passengers for this City, and considerable merchandise. Her passengers numbered 1,300; of these 1,200 were Chinese.

The tannery of ALLING BROTHERS, of Rochester, N. Y., situated at Campbelltown, on the Erie Railway, five miles from Corning, was destroyed by fire on Friday night. The loss has not been ascertained; insurance, $12,000.

The funeral of FREDERICK SEYMOUR, late Governor of British Columbia, took place June 16 at Esquimalt, Vancouver's Island. Sir JAS. DOUGLAS, Chief Justice NEMOHAM, and Captains HOPE and MOST, of the Royal Navy, acted as pallbearers. The entire population of Victoria attended the funeral. Military salutes and minute guns from the war vessels were fired. Mr. MCGROVE, of Newfoundland, who has been appointed Governor of British Columbia, will leave England immediately for Victoria.

The President is expected in Washington to-day, and nearly all the Cabinet before the middle of the week. It is stated that the Cuban question will be considered at the next Cabinet meeting, and some definite policy decided upon.

Disturbances are reported in Mississippi. Lawless men are becoming so troublesome in certain portions of the State, that military measures have been taken to check them.

I. C. PARKINSON has been nominated for Congress by the Democrats of the Third Congressional District of Alabama. He is a Northerner, and settled in Alabama in 1866.

Vice-President COLFAX is expected at Hartford, Conn., on Wednesday. He will have a reception at the residence of FLINT JEWELL, father of Governor JEWELL.

A negro named CYRUS COACHMAN was hanged in Charleston, S. C., on Friday, for the murder of ROBERT F. SUGGS, a white man, in January last. The Sheriff, the ministers who officiated, and nearly all the guards were colored.

Chief Justice CHASE leaves Raleigh to-day for Richmond.

Rev. E. R. KEYES, a prominent German of the New-York Methodist Conference, having renounced the doctrine of that Church, addressed an immense audience in the Swedenborgian Church, in Poughkeepsie, yesterday, explaining the cause of his conversion to the latter Church. His course has created a profound sensation.

The steamer Cricket, from Key West, to New-York, went ashore on St. Augustine (Fla.) Bar on the 14th and is a total loss.

By the carelessness of the engineer of a freight train, named RYAN, an immense destruction of property was caused on the Erie Railroad, on Saturday night. The bridge over the Passaic River was opened to admit the passage of a schooner; the engineer failed to notice this fact, and as a consequence, an engine, tender, and fourteen cars were precipitated through the opening into the river. Fortunately no lives were lost.

A farmer named JACOB SHTTLEMOYER, living near Wilmore, Cambria County, Penn., was killed a few days ago by one of a party of drunken young fellows, at a "bark-peeling" which his neighbors had got up for his benefit, he having recently lost a horse.

Two men, known as "Monte Bill" and PAUL WILSON, got into a fight in gambling saloon in Sheridan, Kansas, recently, over a game, when WILSON drew a pistol and shot "Monte Bill" dead. In the confusion that followed the murderer escaped.

A little girl aged seven years, the daughter of WILLIAM H. DAVIS, of Janelew, West Virginia, was shot and dangerously wounded a few days ago by a boy a year older, son of a Mr. SHUTTLESWORTH, of the same place. The boy had got hold of a gun about the house which happened to be loaded. The girl received fourteen shots in the neighborhood of her right shoulder.

Terminating Rebel Disfranchisement.

The question of putting an end to the present suffrage disabilities of those connected with the rebellion is engaging attention more and more throughout the country. In some of the leading Southern States, like Virginia and Tennessee, it has become one of the principal political issues. Influential Southerners of the most diverse party connections and personal antecedents, from General ROBERT E. LEE to Parson BROWNLOW, are taking the ground that the time has come when there should no longer be a proscribed class before the ballot-box. The growing prevalence of the same spirit in the Northern political counsels is manifest to every observer.

The fact is that the first intense, impulsive, indiscriminating heat against the rebellion and all concerned in it has given place with the lapse of time, to cooler, calmer thinking. The treatment of the conquered rebels is now weighed with more regard to the true interests of the whole country. Opinions upon it are shaped less by private feeling and more by considerations of sound public policy.

Among the Union men of the South—even the Radical portion of them—there is a perception of a bad anomaly in a state of things under which the highest prerogative of citizenship is denied to thousands of the most wealthy, intelligent and virtuous; while it is freely exercised by tens of thousands who have lived all their lives until very lately in the most debasing slavery and benighted ignorance.

The Radicals of the North, too, are growing more sensible of this incongruity. It is hard for them to keep up their old cry of "manhood suffrage," and make the application stop short of the white race. If their principle is worth anything at all, its validity is absolute, and its application must be universal. It has come to this—as every thinking man foreknew from the outset—that the Radicals cannot nourish their resentments against the Southern white man, except at the expense of the "impartial, equal right" platform, the abstract justice of which was all that ever gave them any standing-place in the politics of the country. Thus it is that the very class of Northern politicians who have been most implacable toward the South are preparing to yield something, from the sheer necessity of keeping a square and clear position before the people.

Withal, there is something in this permanent proscription that is calculated to make it unpopular, without any reference to party divisions. It is essentially un-American—opposed to the whole spirit of our institutions, and to the fundamental principles of our Government. There is not a monarchical rule in Europe which has not its long list of proscrits—men who have been outlawed all their lives for some kind of insubordination. This persecution is in perfect harmony with a system which lives and has its being only in brute force, and knows no such thing as an inherent personal right. But we live in a Republic which professes to be sustained purely by the "consent of the governed," and which declares certain natural rights "inalienable." That cannot be called a government of the people from the privileges of which a considerable fraction of the people, for any cause, are excluded. To impose taxation and all the other burdens of Government upon any person, while depriving him of representation and all the benefits of Government, has been to the American mind, from the beginning, the very essence of tyranny. The very love for constitutional law which impelled the great majority to fight the rebellion with such good heart, makes it all the harder to follow up the conquered rebellion with pains and penalties so alien to the Constitution.

It may be allowed that disfranchisement, with its attendant "iron-clad oath," for a time served some good purpose. But that is really no argument for their continuance. There is no reason in perpetually heaping up an extreme medicine in advanced convalescence, simply because it did some good at a more dangerous stage of the disease. Everybody knows that the time must come when the extreme resort must be discontinued, or the patient be the worse for it. For a while, after the overthrow of the rebellion, the Southern temper was so hot and vindictive with disappointment that it was easily moved to evil by its old leaders, and reconstruction was thereby greatly hindered, until it became palpable that these leaders must somehow be hampered and disabled, or disorder rage indefinitely. Therefore these temporary disabilities were temporarily imposed; and with good effect. The irritation of the masses, left without this stimulus, presently gave way to sober thought, and it gradually became clear to the whole Southern mind that it was best to forget the past, and be on good terms once more with the old Government. This feeling grew until the rebellion was no longer spoken of or thought of by any class, except as "the lost cause." And to-day scarcely a trace of the old rebellious spirit ventures to show itself anywhere. Practically, the South is now just as clear as the North of any purpose to organize resistance against Federal authority. The suspension of habeas corpus, which the Northern people were made to feel during the war, would be scarcely more out of time, if revived now, than are these civil disabilities, still visited upon the South. The rebellion has forever passed, and with it should pass forever away from both parts of the country the last glimmering of its cruel necessities.

If there was any significance in the last Presidential election, it was just this which the people of both sections pronounced for, in uniting as they so generally did upon General GRANT, with his watchword—"Let us have Peace." The peace that was then voted was no hollow pretext, or sham affair. It was honest, heartfelt peace, springing from a sense of common brotherhood and common interest—a peace sought and found in its natural course, laid in liberal forgiving sentiments, and in principles purely pacific, as far removed as the poles from all intolerance and proscription. Despite of the opposition of the few malignants on either side, it will yet be the glory of this Administration to fulfill its assigned work, by making this peace a genuine and grand reality.

Last Words.

It is befitting that, on the day when we are called upon to pay the last sad honors to our departed friend and chief, we should lay before the readers of the TIMES the words of regret, of condolence and of appreciation which the announcement of his untimely death has evoked in every part of the country. Our readers will be gratified to see how general is the desire to do justice to Mr. RAYMOND's memory as a public man. The voice of criticism is not, indeed, hushed; but those who differed most widely with him on political questions, now hasten to acknowledge the sincerity of his purposes and the lofty purity of his motives. On one point especially some of our contemporaries dwell with just weight,—his firm, wise, hopeful and courageous course during the war. The service he performed at the crisis of the country's fate is fittingly acknowledged, even by those journals that find most to censure in his subsequent political career; as the Syracuse Standard checks its criticism to say:

"When many of the earnest gazers upon the troubled horizon saw only clouds of doubt, the TIMES pierced the murky covering and revealed the sun of hope still shining. When distrust assailed the Administration, it stood behind it a sure rock of defence. It nerved the timid Unionist while it defied the bold Secessionist. It asked no quarter from the nation's foes and it gave none. In all the words of censure which are laid upon the grave of HENRY J. RAYMOND, let not his efforts in defence of our nationality be forgotten. Let the memory of them bloom a perennial plant above his tomb."

The readers of the TIMES know well how fully this tribute is deserved. No higher panegyric could be pronounced over the grave of any man, and of no one could it be more truly said than of Mr. RAYMOND. His memory needs no other defence than his own record, as an editor and as a public man, impartially scrutinized; and as the clouds of party feeling pass away, and his views and actions stand more clearly revealed in their relations to parties and events, the country will more truly feel that in losing Mr. RAYMOND it has lost a man whose constant endeavor was to promote the general good.

The Georgia Decision.

It were too much, perhaps, to expect very cordial acquiescence in the decision just rendered by the Supreme Court of Georgia, by politicians who have urged the exclusion of colored citizens from office and from the Legislature. The judicial interpretation of the local law, as governed by the provisions of the new Constitution and the terms of the Fourteenth Amendment, conflicts too directly with the position assumed by the Democrats of the State, to be accepted with a very good grace. And yet there is no escaping the result. The right of the negro to office has been affirmed by the recognized authority, and sensible men will make no attempt to evade or resist its application.

If the Augusta Constitutionalist represents any constituency, however, there are politicians in Georgia to whom no settlement involving the political equality of the races is even tolerable. Thus the Augusta journalist insists that it is in the power of the present Legislature, by whom negro members were expelled, to enact the ineligibility of the negro to office. "What is to prevent the Legislature," the Constitutionalist asks, "from repealing that part of the Code' which invests all citizens with a right to office, "and then passing a law prohibiting the negro from holding any State office?"

As to the restoration of the expelled members to their seats in the Legislature, it is boldly declared that the decision has no effect. We pointed out the other day that at the time of the expulsion its noisiest advocates met the proposal to leave the question to the Supreme Court with an assertion of the absolute right of each House to be the sole judge of the qualifications of its members. This view now reappears. "No other Court can control that judicial judgment in the matter," remarks the Constitutionalist:

"So, the result of this Supreme Court decision comes to this: WHITE, and the few other negroes elected to office have temporary authority to hold their positions. The negroes elected to the General Assembly cannot get back, because the Supreme Court has nothing to do in their case, judgment in the matter resting solely with the two Houses. If the General Assembly should repeal the debatable statutes of the Code pretended to have a bearing upon this matter, the vexed question would be put beyond dispute, and Georgia still stand as a State governed by white men, BROWN and MCCAY to the contrary notwithstanding."

We trust that these foolish suggestions will be disregarded by those to whom they are addressed. They are pregnant with mischief to the State, because incompatible with that pacific settlement of outstanding causes of controversy in the accomplishment of which all classes are deeply interested.

The only pretext for the exclusion of negroes from the Legislature and from local office has been an alleged difference of interpretation of the State Constitution and Code. The reasonableness of an interpretation which saw barriers to office-holding, while admitting that none existed to the exercise of the suffrage, was never apparent. But at least it was presented with a profession of good faith. The Supreme Court was the proper tribunal for disposing of the question, and by its dictum all men not intent upon fomenting discord will abide. The Legislature may indeed fall back upon its exclusive authority over the qualifications of its members, and may pass a law making color a ground of ineligibility to office. These steps are of course possible. But their injustice and inexpediency are so apparent that only demagogues will venture to recommend them. For instead of allowing the judgment of the Court to heal irritating sores and reestablish harmony between the action of the State and the purposes of the National Government, they will, by the proposed procedure, multiply the causes of contention and strengthen the hands of those who urge a renewal of Congressional interference. It was bad enough that members were expelled under a pretended regard for law. To persist in the wrong after it has been judicially shown that the law warrants no such interpretation, and, still more, to enact a law in order that a proscription now lacking in the statute-book may be supplied, would be something worse than an error of policy. It would be an act of defiance which would go far toward justifying a fresh exercise of Federal authority.

The opportunity for closing an ugly controversy is one which Georgia should not lose. It may now honorably recede from a position which the apologists of harsh measures have used to some effect, and avert further difficulty without trouble or delay. We hope that moderate and just counsels will prevail in a matter fraught with consequences so seriously affecting the future of the State.

Water and Gas Supply for New-York.

The supply of drinking water in sufficient quantities and gas of good quality for this City are difficult problems, whose early solution is daily becoming highly important. Attention has been called by the Central Park Commissioners to the fact that in a few years more, should the City increase in population and extent in the like proportion of the past decade or two, as without doubt it will, the Croton River will be wholly insufficient to supply New-York City, and other fountains will have to be sought and other costly aqueducts built. Already the necessity of other reservoirs is apparent. Those existing are neither of a capacity nor an elevation sufficient to supply the upper stories of many dwellings in various localities; and as the demand increases this deficiency will naturally be still further felt by those persons living furthest from the reservoirs and at the greater elevations. Lately another difficulty in this matter of the water supply has been discovered in the pollution of the streams supplying Croton River by the erection of gas houses, slaughter pens, and other like establishments on their banks, until with other impurities of older existence, it is a matter of grave doubt as to what we really do drink in our Croton.

Outside of Broadway we have not a decently lighted street in the City, and the brightness at various points and not along its whole length of that principal thoroughfare, is due to the private enterprise of the shopmen and showmen. It is not better lighted by the City authorities than any other of our streets. To be sure, there is no reason why it should be, but there is certainly good reason why all our streets should be much better lighted than they are at present. We pay to the gas monopolists a very high sum for our street lamps, and are entitled to a better light for the money which is paid. It is therefore a matter for congratulation that a new and superior light is being manufactured in this City, and that there is some remote chance that at a future day we shall enjoy its illuminating powers in our streets and houses. A light of ten-fold the brilliancy and power of the present gaslight, at half its cost, is precisely what is needed at this time.

MINOR TOPICS.

The leading article in last Monday's issue of the TIMES, which was from the pen of Mr. RAYMOND, was entitled "General GRANT's Administration—Public Sentiment in Regard to It." The article was one of his clearest and most vigorous leaders, and attracted a great deal of attention in the Press of the country. In its defence of the conduct of General GRANT thus far, and the action of his Administration, it was discriminating, just and generous. Its position was in keeping with that which its writer has maintained toward President GRANT ever since, through his journal and in Congress, he first mentioned GRANT's name for the Presidency. In his death, GRANT has lost a supporter who has been strong and consistent from the first to the last, and whose influence, we imagine, has been of a very effective character.

The Wallabout improvement is rapidly approaching completion, and, if properly used, will be a great convenience to the people of Brooklyn and Williamsburg, considerably shortening the route between the two districts. But there is danger that the new road may be perverted to the sole use and pecuniary profit of a street railroad which runs along the new street. The citizens to whom the improvement is most important are fearful that the influence of the railroad company will be exerted to prevent the completion of the sidewalks for foot passengers, and thus render it necessary that all crossing Wallabout Bay by this route shall take the cars. This would be a very heavy tax on the people, and one which ought to be resisted by them.

"In plain English," says the Pall Mall Gazette, "we ought never to attach the smallest importance to any speech or declaration of policy which comes to us from the United States." This is said apropos of the general expression of American opinion concerning Mr. SUMNER's Alabama speech. Well, it is to a certain extent true. No one man's utterances can ever be taken as the voice of the American people, nor as of any practical importance, unless he be a man intrusted with official power to act. We do not recognize here the shades of responsibility which obtain in European Governments, and which invest different men or journals with such modifications of power that their sayings are to be regarded as "official," "semi-official," "almost semi-official," &c., phrases to be seen every day in European journals. When Congress passes a law, or the President issues a proclamation, or one of his Secretaries puts forth an authorized document, it may be regarded as of official import. All other utterances are but a part of public opinion.

The astute but short-sighted Imperialism of France took the trouble a few days ago to suppress an edition of the International newspaper because it contained an unpleasant allusion to LOUIS NAPOLEON'S London life. Being missed, the paper was everywhere inquired for, and the offensive paragraph was of course in the mouths of all Paris. Had the journal been permitted to appear and no notice been taken of it, the reminiscence would hardly have been heard of. It is said that the acquisition of wealth makes men stingy. Certainly the acquisition of power often makes them stupidly timid. LOUIS NAPOLEON ought to have learned by this time that his shadow can do him no harm except when he is frightened by it.

The ancient military monarchy of Austria is teaching the nations how fast it is possible for "an old dog" to "learn new tricks." The civil authorities now are forbidden to enforce the sentences of military courts, and the military authorities are prohibited from meddling with citizens, except in matters strictly within their own purview. Indeed, the advancement of Austria from heavy-handed despotism toward real national and individual liberty, since the "sharp, short and decisive" fight with Prussia has been and is one of the most wonderful phenomena of this age of wonders.

The new Government of Spain, having taken to suppressing Republicans and arresting Carlists and Isabellists, would seem to be taking the back track again. The prevention of anarchy and the preservation of order are doubtless very necessary. But suppression is as dangerous a mode of dealing with political as with physical forces; it invites explosion.

The suggestions current in English journals of modifying, enlarging, reducing or utterly abolishing the House of Lords, proceeding as they have pari passu with the discussion of the Irish Church bill in that body, will probably feel the effect of their Lordships' action in passing the bill to a second reading. The fact that, despite the powerful opposition which was manifested at first, the majority for the bill became so large as it did, shows that the peers are decidedly susceptible to the pressure of public opinion; and such being the case, their conservative tendencies in legislation will be regarded as a positive advantage.

We relieved our minds the other day on the subject of people's jumping upon the front platforms of street cars, whereby so many, often fatal, accidents occur. It seems almost impertinent to common sense to suggest that jumping off the car is also very dangerous; and especially to say that unless one is desirous of throwing himself along the ground, if he will jump, he should jump forward, with the motion of the car. This would seem obvious to the most simple-minded. And yet not a day passes that we do not see full-grown men, and impatient women almost always, stepping from the car platform either straight out from the side or backward, away from the horses, and holding on to the rear brace, too, which is almost sure to twist them to a fall. Will people never learn to look before leaping?

We praise the prudence of Mr. CHEVALIER, who, when he goes up in his balloon, makes very short trips and comes down long before the public mind can be too severely agitated by surmises respecting his safety. We hope he will continue in that prudent course, and, indeed, set aside all notion of changing his tactics and going across the Atlantic. That "air-line" has too broad a gauge to be ventured on by any vehicle so light as a balloon, even with the accompaniment of a canvas raft, capable of inflation in an emergency.

Our yesterday's report of the new oxygen light discovered by M. DU MOTAY was one to interest everybody. All our chemists are delighted with the new light, and we are told that it can be supplied for half the cost of the present illumination. A few weeks will decide the matter. Meantime everything seems to show that the world is benefited by another chemical discovery—one that may yet lead to some important changes in our social system of economics. One of the changes may be a stoppage of that knavish custom of boring holes in the regular gas-meters.

Sir ISAAC NEWTON was in the habit of saying that a thoughtful persistence is capable of effecting the most important discoveries. Certainly Mr. PAINE, of Newark, is persisting, in the matter of his electro-magnetic, which has flurried men's expectations on more than one occasion. He has got his "power" beyond doubt, but the question of its cheapness is yet to be decided. He say a battery of twenty-horse power can be fed with acids and zinc for a dollar a day. He has his new "gasoline" too, in rivalry of DU MOTAY'S oxyhydrogen light. These things are interesting, for the world is never tired of the old text—"Let there be light."

Conspiracy to Murder the Jailer in Canandaigua.

From the Albany Journal, June 19.

We are informed that the United States prisoners confined in jail at Canandaigua entered into a conspiracy to assassinate the keeper of the institution, and then make their escape therefrom. But fortunately the plot was discovered in time by the jailer to enable him to frustrate the designs of those engaged in it. Two of the prisoners who were shackled together, and, of course, occupied the same cell, by some means managed to procure a small saw, with which they managed to saw off the rivets which held the shackles together. This was done during Thursday night, and the plan was arranged for these two prisoners to attack the keeper with the iron shackles, knock his brains out, then take possession of the keys, open the remaining cells, and allow all men a chance to escape.

But the jailer acted more cautiously than usual yesterday morning in opening the cells, and when he reached the cell occupied by the two prisoners who premeditated taking his life, he discovered that the shackles had been removed from their lower limbs. Of course, he did not open the cell until after he had summoned assistance, and then the "nice little job" was spoiled.

Cholera Rampant—More Filibustering Expeditions—Latest News from the Front—War Gossip—That Bruised Soldier—A Spanish Loyal League.

From Our Own Correspondent.

HAVANA, Monday, June 14, 1869.

Events are succeeding each other with alarming rapidity, and it now appears that the squabble is reaching a certain focus and solution—preceded, however, by such scenes of massacre and bloodshed as to astonish all those who until now only knew the Cubans as pliant tools and submissive subjects of the Spaniard. The Cubans have changed, and the Spaniards also; the former for the better, as far as warfare is concerned, and the latter for the worse, in the same respect. Skirmish succeeds skirmish, and the Spanish ranks have been thinning very much. But a new enemy, far more terrible than yellow fever or rifle bullets, has made its reappearance.

THE CHOLERA.

The cholera has broken out with incredible force among the troops at Nuevitas, and other points on the coast, and is already marching with fearful strides toward the interior. The Havana journals keep this fact secret. At a meeting of the Board of Health yesterday, it was resolved to allow the steamers Triunfo and Pajaro to land their passengers and freight, without subjecting them to quarantine or even to fumigation; but it was resolved to fumigate all vessels arriving after date. To give you an idea of the strength of the cholera, I merely cite two instances: Seven Cubans captured a Spanish Lieutenant and three men, who had gone on a hunting expedition near Nuevitas, and were leading them toward an insurgent encampment. They rested during the night near Altamisal. In the morning only one Spanish soldier was alive, the other ten having died during the night. The second case is that of the family of a Spanish officer in Nuevitas; his wife, two children and servant died within three hours. The Cubans were not wrong when they relied on the yellow fever to thin the ranks of the Spaniards; but they did not calculate that cholera would also make its appearance. The Spaniards lose fearfully, but it is equally certain that the mortality among the Cubans is very great, although it is impossible to obtain reliable figures.

TWO EXPEDITIONS LANDED.

Soon after the arrival of the steamer Triunfo the city was full of the wildest statements regarding the capture of an expedition and the killing of the leader and of nearly all the men. The Official Gazette and an extra from the Voz de Cuba give copious details, whose only drawback is that they are very much exaggerated or else almost entirely the reverse of the truth. From various private correspondents I have received sufficient information to enable me to give an impartial account of the landings and subsequent events, without drawing much on the Government reports. The first expedition, composed of 100 men, landed at Baitiquaeri, about sixty miles east of Santiago de Cuba. The schooner which brought them was from New-York, and had touched at some port in Jamaica. The men appeared to be composed of Americans, Dominicans and Cubans. The negro guide betrayed them by leading them first into a thick wood. During the night he made his escape unperceived, and informed the commander at Guantanamo, while a mounted ordenance informed the garrison at Baracoa. Before mid-day 700 men, composed of troops, volunteers and country people who were forced to accompany the troops were at hand. The filibusters were surrounded, and although outnumbered, fought desperately. The superior numbers of their opponents, their own fatigue, told upon them, however, and a large number were killed, among them the reputed leader of the expedition. Several were captured and taken to Santiago de Cuba to be executed there. The others made a rush through the Spanish ranks and escaped. At latest dates they were still at large, although letters from Santiago de Cuba, written by Spaniards, announced that they were captured. The troops captured, according to the official reports, four hundred Remington rifles, two small pieces of artillery, three cartloads of baggage, a large amount of ammunition, and over two millions of unsigned patriot currency of the denominations of one, two, five, twenty and fifty dollars, which had arrived in Havana. Private letters received later state that every man belonging to the expedition was either killed or captured.

The second expedition, composed of 150 men, bringing also a large amount of ammunition, landed in the jurisdiction of Guantanamo and joined the forces in the interior unmolested. The troops sent in their pursuit either could or would not find them. Some report this expedition as coming from Jamaica, while others assert that it came from the United States.

MISCELLANEOUS WAR NEWS.

The great noise made by the Spaniards about the battle of Mayari and the capture of flags, canon, &c., has at last subsided. The flags were found in a trunk left on shore after disembarking. Some Spaniards in Santiago de Cuba have become so disgusted at the palpable system of lying on the part of the commanders, that they are no longer so confident of the triumph of Spanish arms, but have expressed their willingness to sell their property at any sacrifice in order to raise money and return to Spain. Should they be unable to sell, they express themselves ready to burn their property, without taking into account that the property of other people who do not wish to leave would be endangered.

The report of the battle at Puerto del Padre is confirmed, and although the Spaniards give very glowing accounts, it does not appear that they have gained any material advantage by their victory. No official account has been published yet, but private letters announce that the Spaniards, numbering 2,700, were attacked by about 800 Cubans, who, on the first rush, captured a convoy. The capture of the convoy produced a scene of disorder among the Cubans, many of whom left the ranks to inspect the contents of the wagons. General MARMOL seeing the danger of this movement, tried to rally them, and force them back into the lines, when the enemy at the same moment fell upon them with great fury, and owing to the broken lines of the Cubans, redeemed the convoy, but with heavy loss. The troops lost 400 men, killed and wounded; the Cubans, according to Spanish accounts, more than double. General FERRER, Major BONIGUE, and other Spanish commanders, were wounded, and MARMOL was killed.

Colonel LOPEZ CAMARA announces that he had an engagement with the enemy on the 8th at Camp San Simon, with from 800 to 1,000 insurgents. He destroyed the huts of the camp and secured many arms, much ammunition and two pieces of cannon. Colonel CAMARA says that he caused a great many deaths among the enemy, and gives his own loss at none killed and ten men wounded or bruised. Colonel CAMARA is the same hero who captured the forty hats not heads, and in the dispatch forgot to mention that the two cannon were only two cast-iron tubes mounted on wheels, intended to kill more gunners than enemies.

The colored Havana volunteers had an engagement on the 2d at Listados, near the Nuevitas Railroad. The insurgent loss is not given; that of the volunteers was one killed and one wounded. About sixty of these volunteers had deserted and joined the Cubans.

An engagement took place at Holguin on the 7th inst., lasting several hours. The Spanish account announces five killed, seven wounded and two bruised, and gives the loss of the Cubans at fifty-five dead, found on the battle-field. They also say they captured a mountain howitzer, fifty muskets and some small arms. All Spanish accounts of this and other engagements confess that the insurgents fought with great valor.

Villa Clara continues besieged. The Cuban forces in that vicinity are estimated to consist of about 2,000 men.

LESCA continues to give accounts of scirmmages, the last having taken place on the 12th, at Ciego Montero, where the Cubans attacked the garrison and were repulsed with a loss of fifteen killed.

THE BRUISED SOLDIER.

The bruised soldier again appears in the Gaceta as the solitary horseman of G. P. R. JAMES. The hero of the Battle of the Hats, Colonel CAMARA, announces that on the morning of the 8th, the insurgents attacked the Santa Isabel plantation, and that the troops repulsed and pursued the enemy. The only loss of the heroic sons of the Old was one bruised soldier. This single bruised soldier has held the field long enough, and he ought to give way to the smashed, burned or drunken soldier. Anything for a change say the natives.

NEWS FROM PUERTO PRINCIPE.

The withdrawal of all available troops from the neighborhood of Puerto Principe has once more placed that jurisdiction in the power of a few hundred Cubans, who keep the different small garrisons continually on the alert and wear them out. ESCALANTE has already demanded more troops, but nobody knows where they are to come from. At least 50,000 soldiers are needed to occupy the territory held by the insurgents and keep them in check, and even that number would be barely sufficient. When we consider that the Spaniards do not outnumber 19,000 available fighting men, the situation of affairs and ultimate result can very easily be arrived at.

SPANISH MEETINGS.

The Spaniards have been trying hard to organize a society on the style of our Loyal Leagues, but with indifferent success. Two parties are in existence here, or perhaps three, of which the elements are so incongruous as to make it difficult for them to harmonize. One party, or the so-called negrero party, is composed of the old slave traders and such merchants as oppose to the light of reason and the spirit of the age. Their intention was to make a so-called Casino a point of reunion for Spaniards, whose patriotism was beyond reproach, and whose political ideas were in consonance with the teachings of the reverend fathers of the times of the Inquisition. This party has money and influence, but no brains, and having the holy horror all ignorant men have for educated men, they resolved in a primary meeting not to admit any Government officials as members, (very sensible, that,) and to call the banting El Casino Peninsular,—that is to say, composed of men who were born in old Spain. GIL GELPI, the editor of the Prensa, was in his glory, and imagined himself every inch a king, while delivering a speech which he undoubtedly considered very witty and profound, and which the largest portion of his hearers did not understand, the ignorant portion because it contained too many metaphors for the educated, because they could not effect any connection of thoughts, the speech being sufficiently rambling. The negreros and Bodegeros applauded, and everything appeared to augur the success of the retrograde party, when the Vos de Cuba party, represented by CASTANON, SUAREZ, VIGIL and several others, refuted every argument, more with biting sarcasm than with reason, and achieved their first victory in having the society named El Casino Espanol instead of Peninsular, thus opening its doors to every man loyal to Spain, whether born in old Spain or in any of its colonies, and also defeating the measure that no Government employes should be admitted. At the meeting held yesterday Mr. SEGUNDO RIGAL was elected President. Well-known merchants make up the Executive Committee. Mr. GELPI barely managed to be elected one of the Consulting Committee. Let us see what they will do.

QUASIMODO.

The Excise Question—Opinion of the Attorney-General.

STATE OF NEW-YORK,
OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL,
ALBANY, June 17, 1869.

A. A. Demarest, Esq., Clerk Board of Excise Commissioners:

SIR: Your letter of a recent date, inquiring on behalf of the Commissioners of Excise of the County of Rockland as to the proper construction of chapter 856 of the Laws of 1860, known as the amendment to the Excise law, has been considered.

The fourth section of the act declares: "All the provisions of this act as amended shall be held to apply to the sale of ale or beer except so much thereof as forbids the granting of license to any person except to such persons as propose to keep an inn, tavern or hotel, and the Commissioners of Excise may in their discretion grant license for the sale of ale or beer for a sum not less than $10 to other than those who propose to keep an inn, tavern or hotel."

The obvious intention of the Legislature in this provision was to first enact that ale and beer if sold without license should be regarded as within the inhibitions of the general Excise law amended. It had been made in certain cases, prior to the passage of this amendment, a disputed question of fact to be tried upon evidence, and determined by the jury in prosecutions for infractions of the Excise law, whether ale or beer were strong and spirituous liquors within the true intention of the Excise law.

The first part of this amendment was intended to bring ale and beer within the law, and save future litigation upon the question of whether it was included as a question of fact before a jury.

I am of opinion it was the intention of the Legislature, in the remaining portion of the amendment, to empower the Commissioners of Excise to license persons other than hotel-keepers to sell ale and beer, to be drank upon their premises, without the compliance by such persons with any other condition, as a prerequisite to the license, than the payment of a sum not less than $10 therefor.

In the Excise law, as it existed when this amendment was passed, there was no authority given the Commissioners to license any person to s

FOREIGN NEWS BY MAIL.

ARRIVAL OF THE STEAMSHIP CITY OF BROOKLYN.

The Inman steamship City of Brooklyn, which left Liverpool June 10 and Queenstown June 11, reached this port yesterday. The intelligence thus received is later by three days than that by the Hermann.

Between 5 and 6 o'clock on the morning of June 10 an explosion occurred in Ferndale Colliery, Rhonda Valley, belonging to D. DAVIS & SONS. Forty persons were supposed killed. Up to 2:30 P. M., thirty bodies were brought up.

The Manchester Courier reports the failure of LIVESY & THORPE, of Manchester and Liverpool. Liabilities estimated at $250,000 to $300,000. The failure was attributed to commitments of the Liverpool branch, the Manchester house showing a handsome surplus. It was feared this failure would place several others in difficulties which, if not surmounted, would throw many hands out of employment.

The results of thirty-one elections to the Chamber of Deputies of the Netherlands have come to hand. Of the successful candidates 20 are Liberals, 14 of whom sat in the last Chamber; and 11 are Conservatives, of whom 8 are new members. A second balloting will be necessary in five electoral districts. The result of six elections were not known. The periodical elections of members to the Second Chamber had been held in Amsterdam, and in that city the three Liberal candidates were all elected. The result of the Provincial elections was not yet known.

Letters from Lisbon announce the morganatic marriage of Don FERDINAND, Ex-King of Portugal, with FANNY ESSLER. This, says Galignani, must be a second union, as the celebrated dancer had accepted in 1854, if we remember rightly, the hand of a rich Prussian banker. The other sister, THERESA, surnamed the Majestic, became the wife of Prince ADALBERT, brother of the King of Prussia. FANNY was born in 1810, so that she has now arrived at the age of 59. Rumor, when she was young, placed the Duke DE REICHSTADT amongst her warmest admirers.

THE FRENCH EMPIRE

Graphic Account of the Electoral Disturbances in Paris.

Paris (June 8) Correspondence Morning Herald.

The result of the elections, which became generally known at an early hour last evening, caused great excitement in Paris, and, though the excitement did not exactly amount to a riot, there was evidently a riotous disposition abroad. For the first time for the last twenty years the "Marseillaise" has been sung on the Central Boulevards, and the denizens of the Quartier of the Bourse and the Rue Vivienne have had the exciting pastime of seeing large mobs skedaddling up and down the Boulevards, chased by whole troops of policemen. I am, however, very sorry to say that to the defective arrangements of the authorities the disturbance, such as it was, is attributable. At about 8:30 o'clock a perfect cloud of policemen, I should say 400 or 500, took up a position along the north side of the Boulevard Montmartre, occupying the great space the corners of the Rue Grange Batelier and the corner of the Rue du Faubourg Montmartre, close to the restaurant formerly known as VACHETTE'S, but now as BREBANT'S. As a matter of course a crowd collected to look at the sergents de ville, wondering what was going to turn up, and another crowd collected to look at the first crowd. The cafés on the Boulevard were instantly filled, and some of them had as many as four rows of tables in front of the shops, all of which were occupied by el fresco constumers. Circulation was difficult, no doubt; but the large, immoveable masses of policemen blocking up the way did not improve it. The weather was most oppressive, not a breath of air stirring, and the atmosphere filled with a kind of minute dust perceptible to the eye. In short, the weather was stormy, and Frenchmen, whether they be lookers-on or policemen, are remarkably subject to electric influences. At 8:30 the Police proceeded in a body to the office of the Rappel, to effect its seizure, and arrested a man who persisted in selling it in defiance of the veto. He made a terrible row, screaming like a madman, whither the Police pursued, and finally carried him, dragging him away to the Station-house, while he shouted à Passionate. A large crowd followed, hooting the Police. Meanwhile the crowd increased in numbers, and frequent cries were heard of "Vive Rochefort!" and "Des Lanternes." This went on for some time, when all at once a band of about 400 or 500 men, said to be students, debouched from the Rue Vivienne, singing the "Marseillaise," and shouting "Vive Rochefort!" and I am also told, but did not hear it, "A bas Jules Favre!" The Police then made a charge all along the northern pathway of the Boulevard, and the crowd in rushing along overturned the tables outside the cafés, and in many instances the customers too. Several persons came to grief, I am told, during this first charge, and I saw one woman carried off in a state of unconsciousness. A little after the cries of "Vive Rochefort!" and the "Marseillaise" were again attempted, followed by another charge of the Police, and that will sort of indistinct clamor which marks the French crowd in its angry mood. All the cafés on the north side were then cleared by the policemen, cleared of their customers, and shut up. This, of course, partly increased the numbers outside, and the persons thus disturbed were in no cheerful mood. All of a sudden—how it happened I don't know—but the crowd and the Police were suddenly transferred to the south side; there was a wild shout, another charge, and a regular stampede. The Passage des Panoramas was then closed, and also the library of Latraix at the corner of the Rue Vivienne. Presently the cafés began getting out their shutters, and the customers outside invited to finish their beer, coffee, or ice, and move on. Some did and some didn't. Then there was some yelling at the Police, more charges, more stampedes, and this sort of thing was still going on with undiminished spirit at 1 o'clock this morning, when I left. I heard that in the course of the evening there were from 100 to 120 persons arrested. The above is a plain, unvarnished narrative of what I myself saw. I must confess that when I read some of the papers this morning I was rather startled to find that they had matters far worse than they had appeared to me. For instance, the National gives another account, which, with that impartiality which I am always anxious never to depart from, relates a great many things which I certainly did not see. It says that when the crowd stationed before the Rappel office saw the great reinforcements the Police were receiving, it began to shout "Rochefort!" and "Des Lanternes!" on the well-known and congenial air of "Des lampions." These demonstrations were considered by the Police as hostile, and clouds of verminte de Vile second rose from the ground. The people who were drinking and smoking before, or in the cafés, which stretch between the Faubourg Montmatre and the Rue Drouot, having joined in the shouts in favor of ROCHEFORT, were in their turn set on by the Police; the tables were knocked down, beer, coffee and ices were strewn along the Boulevard in an unsavory mess, mingled with men's hats and women's shawls and bonnets. Regular charges were made, which had more serious consequences than the breaking of crockery. The National even says that there were killed and wounded, and quotes a letter stating that a man was stabbed in the thigh by a policeman's sword.

As regards the disturbance of the Quartier Latin, I have as yet no particulars of it; but several accounts from eye-witnesses tell me that there was a regular set-to between the students and the Police.

While these riotous scenes were taking place sub Dio M. THIERS was holding a level in the Place St. George's. The doors of his hotel were thrown open, and hundreds came to shake hands with him and congratulate him on his success. Earlier in the evening at his Committee-rooms (the chambers of the late M. BEHAYER, in the Rue Neuve des Petits Champs,) there was a grand manifestation in honor of THIERS, and M. DUFAURE (the Chairman of the Committee) made a very telling speech.

EVENING.

There are more particulars of the row on the Boulevards last night. It appears that the Police used so much roughness in clearing the Café de Madrid that they were resisted, and an Inspector of Police knocked down by a blow from a glass, while other sergents used cups, saucers and glasses as projectiles, and pelted the Police with them. All the independent papers agree in stating that the disturbance was due to the presence of the Police, and their attempts to make the crowd—a Boulevard crowd, stationary by habit—move on. Some 15 people were wounded, but there was no loss of life. There was also a scuffle between the people and the Police in front of the Hotel de Ville; but the only place where a real collision took place was in the Quartier Latin, close to the Sorbonne, but I have no reliable accounts of what took place; I am told that the Police charged with drawn swords, but I do not believe it. It remains to be seen who is responsible for the sending of large bodies of Police to so quiet a place as the Boulevard Montmartre, crowded at all times in the evening, and especially at this season of the year, and ordering them to clear it of its habitual frequenters. I firmly believe that if the Police had kept quiet, and not shown in such numbers, there would have been no disturbance at all.

ARGENTINE REPUBLIC

Opening of the Congress of the Argentine Republic.

The official opening of the Congress of the Argentine Republic occurred May 19. The opening and most interesting passage of President SARMIENTO's message read as follows:

Fellow-Citizens of the Senate of the Chamber of Deputies:

On taking leave of you at the close of the preceding session, a heavy care weighed upon your patriotism and impaired the strength of mind required to advance with resolution in the road of those material improvements our country has yet to travel over in order to attain its proper place among free and civilized nations. The war waged in Paraguay, was still going on, notwithstanding all our efforts, without the possibility of fixing a term to its duration. The Government felt convinced that it was impossible unreservedly to devote to other ends the resources of the country or the attention of the authorities, while this war continued. Claiming the first, and being an object to which we, who felt that our chief duty was to save the dignity and the honor of the Republic, were bound to attend.

I have to-day the pleasure of opening your session under more favorable circumstances. The allied arms have defeated the Paraguayan tyrant, and with this material triumph is connected the moral one we gain in the public opinion of the world by the recognition of the justice of our cause, and of the dreadful character of the Gov. ernment and the tyrant against whom we have been forced to fight, in order to defend our soil invaded and our honor trampled upon. He has not yet been dislodged from the mountains, in which he has taken a last refuge; but this work, however ardunous it may turn out, can in nowise affect the result obtained or be an impediment to a happy and glorious termination of the war.

Peace prevails, at the same time, over all the territory which our flag has put in force, and the disturbances that threatened to disturb it have been quelled. We have, therefore, a double motive to feel grateful to Providence.

The state of our foreign relations fulfills the aspirations of the Nation. Nothing is claimed from other nations. We have nothing to ask of them except that they may persevere in manifesting the sympathy with which Governments as well as peoples have honored the Republic, both for its progress and its spirit of fairness.

Bound to the Empire of Brazil, and to the Oriental Republic, by the treaties of May 1, 1865, no incident has come to disturb the good understanding between the three Allied Powers, who have, without any effort, been able to solve the questions that have risen during the continuance of the war.

There is at this moment no idea of organizing a Provisional Government in the Republic of Paraguay, and I can assure you that this idea will be duly carried out, since the three allied Governments continue to be animated by those friendly dispositions that have always guided them, and by the most disinterested feeling toward the Paraguayan people.

With a view of strengthening our good relations with friendly nations, I have appointed an Argentine Minister in Brazil, and have sent a representative to Chili. The proofs of marked welcome with which these diplomats have been received, convince me that I have been fortunate in my choice, and that the Republic will derive the best results from the mission I have intrusted to them.

AMUSEMENTS.

Theatrical and Musical.

ANNOUNCEMENTS OF THE DRAMA.

Three events occur this evening: "Enoch Arden" will be represented at Booth's Theatre for the first time in this City; several of Mr. SELWYN's Boston artistes will enter upon an extended occupancy of the Fifth-avenue Theatre by enacting at that place the drama of "Dora," and the burlesque of "Black-Eyed Susan," and the Grand Opera House will be reopened by Miss LUCILLE WESTERN, who, with a numerous company, will there perform "East Lynne." No change of entertainment will be had elsewhere.

BENEFIT CONCERT.

A concert of real attractiveness will be given at Steinway Hall to-morrow evening for the benefit of the new Methodist Episcopal Church of Hoboken. Dr. WM. BERGE will preside at the organ, and the Berge Choral Union, with other performers, will interpret an extremely liberal and interesting programme.

PERSONAL.

The President kept very quiet at the residence of his brother-in-law yesterday morning, and did not desire any public visitors. In the afternoon he dined with Mr. A. T. STEWART, on Fifth-avenue. He will leave for Washington at noon to-day, accompanied by Mrs. GRANT and children.

Hon. J. A. GARFIELD, of Ohio, and Hon. G. A. GROW, of Pennsylvania, were in town yesterday.

The honorary degree of LL.D. was conferred upon Vice-President COLFAX by Hillsdale College, Michigan, at its late Commencement.

BRENTANO has received a new installment of the English magazines for June, including Belgravia, St. Paule, The Gentleman's Magazine, The Girl of the Period Miscellany, The Leisure Hour, &c.

BRENTANO will close his news depot to-day during the progress of the funeral services of Mr. RAYMOND, out of respect for the memory of the deceased.

POLITICAL.

Four Republican State Conventions are to be held this week. On Wednesday, the Pennsylvania Convention, at Philadelphia; the Ohio Convention, at Columbus, and the Mississippi Conservative Republican Convention, at Jackson. The Maine Convention will be held on Thursday, in Bangor.

C. F. KIMBALL, a prominent merchant of Portland, refuses to permit his name to be used as a candidate for the Democratic nomination for Governor of Maine. He says that he has worked for twenty years in the ranks of the party, and desires to remain in the ranks.

The Republican State Convention in Maine meets at Bangor on Thursday. Governor CHAMBERLAIN will probably be renominated, although there is some opposition to him on the part of the ultra temperance men of the State.

A Nashville correspondent of the Cincinnati Gazette, says that the canvass thus far has been conducted with an absence of bitterness and a show of candor and argument scarcely ever before paralleled in Tennessee. In Nashville no meetings have yet been held upon either side.

A Chicago paper says HORACE GREELEY is expected to speak at the National Irish Republican Convention, in that city, on the 4th of July.

The Cleveland Plain Dealer, a Democratic paper, says Hon. RUFUS P. RANNEY, of that city, seems to be the favorite of a large majority of the Democrats of Ohio as their candidate for Governor.

It is thought that the attendance at the Ohio Republican State Convention in Columbus, on Wednesday, will not be so large as usual, as there is little opposition to a nomination of the present incumbents of the State offices. Governor HAYES will probably be renominated by acclamation.

The New-Orleans Times complains that Mr. A. H. STEPHENS seems to imagine that he has a mission to perform in meddling over the destiny of this country. It thinks his views are colored by a bad stomach and failing health, and tells him that he pays the American people a poor compliment when he sets himself up as an inspired prophet to point for them such a wretched, hopless future.

A New-York correspondent of a Western paper has discovered that a movement has been commenced among some disaffected Republicans for pressing SALMON P. CHASE for President in 1872, and with a supposed intention of coalescing with the Democrats. He says, however, that some who went into the measure at first, have dropped out of it on account of strong leanings toward Tammany Democracy, and a suspicion that it was intended to carry Conservative Republicans into the Democratic ranks. All of which is important if true.

Friends of General ROSECRANS will press his name as a candidate for Governor upon the Ohio Democratic State Convention, which meets July 7.

The Mercer County (Ohio) Democrats recommend Hon. T. J. GODFREY, who was President, pro tem., of the State Senate during the last session, as a suitable candidate for Lieutenant-Governor.

Governor SEYMOUR and General STOKES, the two candidates in Tennessee, are both declared themselves in favor of calling a State Convention to take action upon the question of suffrage.

The call for the Maine Temperance State Convention, to be held in Portland on Tuesday, 29th inst., invites "all temperance men, without regard to past party associations, who regard the vigorous and impartial enforcement of the legal prohibition of the liquor traffic as the paramount issue in the approaching Gubernatorial campaign, and who, in the absence this year of other political issues of greater importance than the perfection of the schemes of aspiring politicians for future aggrandisement and position, are prepared, in the event of unsatisfactory nominations for Governor being made in the State Convention of both political parties, to present and support an independent temperance candidate for that position, to meet at the above mentioned time and place, to decide upon such action as the exigencies of the cause may demand, and to nominate, if necessary, for systematic action at the polls."

Lynch Law in Missouri—A Confidence Man Killed.

From the Kansas City (Mo.) Journal, June 11.

We learn that on Tuesday night a confidence man, named HARRY HOWARD, was chased by the Vigilance Committee from Harlem to the ferry-boat Lizzie Campbell, where he was caught and terribly dealt with. A [illegible] heavy stone attached to one end, which was around the neck, and then he was thrown overboard into the river. He managed to free himself from the stone, and, floating to the rear of the boat, caught hold of the rudder. He was, however, seen by the Committee, and had both his hands cut off. He doubtless was struck, for he disappeared out of sight and dropped down into the water. He has not been heard of since. Whether he is dead or not is unknown.

We understand that a man by the name of JAMES KELLEY was with the unfortunate HOWARD, and that they had been seen together in the afternoon trying their little confidence game upon some stranger in Harlem. KELLEY was also seized by the Vigilants; but, it is said, that falling upon his knees he begged earnestly for mercy. His life was spared upon the promise to leave the country and keep secret what he saw and heard. We could not learn the number of the party or whether they were disguised or not.

BRAZIL.

Diplomatic Difficulty with Brazil—General Webb Suspends Relations and Demands His Passports—Brazil Withdraws Cause of Offence at the Last Moment—Diplomatic Relations Restored.

By the arrival at this port of the steamship Merrimack we are in receipt of highly important news from Brazil. On the 26th of April the Brazilian Minister of Foreign Affairs, to avoid paying a claim, refused to recognize instructions offered to General WEBB by Mr. SEWARD, because he (Mr. SEWARD) had not advised the Brazilian Minister in Washington of such instructions. General WEBB remonstrated in vain. A sharp correspondence ensued, and on the 10th of May General WEBB suspended diplomatic relations and demanded his passports. His passports were sent on the 12th. Great excitement prevailed, and all the correspondence was published. This sustained General WEBB. Public opinion was against the Government, and two hours before the steamer sailed the affair was settled—they granting all that General WEBB had demanded.

Trial of E. H. Yerger for the Murder of Colonel Crane.

From the Cincinnati Commercial.

JACKSON, Miss., Friday, June 18.

The Military Commission met to-day, and after examining six witnesses closed the case for the Government. Much of the testimony was as to the wounds of which Colonel CRANE died.

Captain JOHN H. BARTHOLF, Assistant Surgeon United States Army, testified to examining the body of Colonel CRANE. He found four wounds made by a sharp-cutting instrument—three on his body and one on his left arm. One wound was a quarter of an inch inside of the left nipple, the upper end of the wound being two and a half inches higher and nearer the middle line of the body. In this wound the fourth rib was cut across. Another wound, in the center, was about three inches in length, horizontally, as a man stands, and about two inches in length. It passed between two ribs, notching them both, and was very deep—as far as the longest fingers could reach. The third wound was on the left side of his back, between the ribs and hip. This cut was two and a half to three inches long. It passed backward, and cut off one of the spines. Witness felt the piece of bone with his finger and endeavored to extract it, but it was lost in the blood and flesh. The fourth wound was through his left arm, near the bend of the elbow. The knife entered on the outer side of the arm, where the cut was two inches in length, and emerged on the inner side of the arm, where it showed a cut of a quarter of an inch in length. Colonel CRANE's death was unquestionably caused by the wounds inflicted. The bed-tick in the bed side was full of blood; had bled excessively, saturating his clothing, and continued to ooze for several hours after his death.

Dr. J. F. HARRINGTON testified to carrying the challenge of YERGER to Colonel CRANE. Saw the latter shot at the Duel on the 5th, the day of his death. Colonel CRANE read the letter, and said he would not meet Mr. YERGER on the street. He did not carry arms—never had in his life, and said, "In this matter I have been simply acting in the humble discharge of my duty as a citizen of the city." Witness was requested to pay their fees till YERGER paid his. He said that he did not know YERGER. Some called him Colonel YERGER; others, Prince YERGER. YERGER had sent him a dispatch from Memphis not to take advantage of his absence; had informed that he had already waited twenty days and could wait no longer. Witness begged Colonel CRANE not to go on the street afterward. He delivered this message to YERGER, who was much excited thereat; witness went to dinner, and before he returned Colonel CRANE was killed.

ARTHUR WALKER, witness's steward, examined the body of Colonel CRANE. No arms of any kind were found on his person.

GEO. W. BIRD testified to YERGER saying, as he passed witnes' store on the 5th, "I intend to kill Colonel CRANE."

J. L. CANTRE, testified that YERGER came to him on the morning of the 8th, and said he expected to have a difficulty with Colonel CRANE. He asked the witness to prescribe a drink of whisky and gentian, which he drank. He took off his gold sleeve-buttons and left them with the witness, but gave no reason for so doing.

ANGELO MIAZZE testified that no arms were found on the body of Colonel CRANE. After witness got into the house, Colonel CRANE breathed twice and then died. The witness then closed his eyes.

The prosecution here closed their case, and the commission adjourned till Monday.

An Old Negro Woman Released from Slavery.

From the Chicago Post, June 18.

A reminiscence of Southern barbarism and defiance of law was brought to mind lately in this city, in the person of an old negress of 68, named REBECCA WHALE, who, for nearly seventy years has served under a family named COLEMAN, living near Lexington, Ky. Ever since the Proclamation of Emancipation has the poor woman been defrauded of her rightful liberty by the continued baseness and deceit of those who impiously laid claim to her body and soul.

The woman was born on the Coleman estate, and was, until a short time ago, held in bondage by JAMES COLEMAN. In 1826, she married GEORGE WHALE, and had two sons and two daughters. These were separately sold "down South." Her husband died, leaving then but one girl of 12 years, named ALICE, with the mother. In 1847 she, too, was sold into Louisiana. The COLEMANS, of course, sided with the rebellion at its breaking out, and their property was confiscated. They removed further inland, taking REBECCA with them, and even when peace came they managed to keep her that she was a slave. ALICE followed the twenty-second Illinois from New-Orleans, and finally settled in Chicago, where she married DAVID FAYNE, a liberated bondman. Long search showed her brothers in business in Ohio and Kentucky. Her mother was at last found to be still in Kentucky, and in bondage, and to her the daughter-in-law found her drudging for the COLEMANS, and living in a miserable hovel near by, in rags, with nothing but a bundle of straw for a bed, the only reward of her long servitude, and brought her to Chicago, and the reunited family are now living at No. 132 West Polk-street. Her son-in-law has, by industry, laid up treasures on earth, and the old lady is at last enjoying her long-denied freedom. The other daughter is still unheard from.

Another Dead Body Found at Ravenswood, L. I.

On Friday morning last, Coroner LUNS, of Newtown, held an inquest on the body of an unknown man which was washed upon the beach at Ravenswood. Deceased was dressed in a white cotton undershirt, white linen shirt, new shoes, dark blue pants, pepper-and-salt vest, dark cassimere undercoat and dark blue greatcoat. He appeared to be about 35 years of age; had sandy moustache and dark hair; was five feet seven and a half inches high, and appeared to have been in the water two or three weeks. He had nothing in his pockets except a night-key and a pearl stud. Dr. WHITEHEAD made a post-mortem examination, but could find no mark of violence. The body has been interred in Evergreen Cemetery.

Reckless Use of Firearms—A Man Dangerously Wounded.

JAMES LYNCH, of No. 4 Jackson-place, became so enraged last evening by some boys mischievously breaking his window, that he seized a pistol and fired at one of them. The bullet missed the boys, but took effect in the right side of LAWRENCE GAVIGAN, a man employed to watch a new building in course of erection near by. The wounded man was subsequently removed to Bellevue Hospital in an ambulance, where his condition was pronounced dangerous, as the House Surgeons were unable to find the bullet. The Twenty-eighth Precinct Police arrested LYNCH, and will hold him to await the result of the wound so recklessly inflicted by him.

Outrage on a Little Girl at Mud Creek, Long Island.

A day or two ago JEREMIAH BROWN, of Red Creek, was arrested and brought before Justice CORWIN, charged by the town of Southampton with having violated the person of ANNIE FLEET, a girl 12 years of age. The evidence against BROWN being conclusive, and the girl having given birth to a child, he was ordered to pay the costs, and $1 a week for the support of the infant.

RELIGIOUS SERVICES.

Bishop Janes on Charity.

At the Methodist Episcopal Church, corner of Seventh-avenue and Fourteenth-street, Bishop JANES preached yesterday forenoon for the benefit of the Methodist Episcopal Church in Morrisania. There was a large and fashionable attendance. The reverend gentleman drew his text from Hebrews, ii., 10: "For it becomes him for whom are all things, and by whom are all things in bringing many sons unto glory, to make the captain of their salvation perfect through sufferings." The coming of the Messiah was ordained by the Father to bring the sons of men to glory. Such was the purpose of God. Knowing ourselves to be wicked and sinful by nature, we can find nothing so glorious as beauty of moral character. Wherefore the Almighty proposes to give each of us a different character, having provided for us redemption, a clear heart and right spirit by the sacrifice of Jesus our Lord. He intended mankind to accomplish great results in His enterprise of human creation, not to be like the flowers whose morning bloom is blighted by the night clouds of adversity, but sturdy trees of righteousness bearing fruit. Men are called to be colaborers with Him in the field of salvation, for He looks upon a soul redeemed as a greater work than a world's creation. For this purpose Christ took upon himself our nature, sufferings and death. He is our perfect captain, having overcome Satan by prayer and fastings and death by the resurrection. Let us, therefore, turn to Him with willing hearts, clothe ourselves with His righteousness, and have eternal life and happiness.

After the sermon a large collection was taken up, Mr. CORNELL giving $50. The church borders on $20,000, of which, the day's receipts, $6,000 have been raised. The church to rebuild the Methodist Episcopal Church in Morrisania, dedicated last November and destroyed by the severe storms last Winter. Rev. Mr. LONGACRE, pastor of Methodist Episcopal Church corner of Seventh-avenue and Fourteenth-street, will receive and retain for Rev. Mr. LONGACRE any contributions.

Dr. Thrall on "The Gospel's Wayside Blessings."

Dr. THRALL preached last evening in the Church of the Ascension, corner of Fifth-avenue and Tenth-street, taking as his text the words of the Psalmist "Blessed is the people that know the joyful sound."

The main purpose of the Gospel, he said, is to conduct our souls in safety to Heaven; but in its march toward this grand object, it scatters priceless blessings along the way. It is to these secondary blessings that I would direct your attention at this time. The tendency of the Gospel is to improve and elevate and beautify; it finds its disciples oftentimes in the cellar, but it does not leave them there; it does not refuse to enter a Hottentot hut or a drunkard's cabin, but once admitted, it immediately sets to work to purify the filth, to put glass in the windows and flowers around the door. An instance in point occurred in the Fulton-street Prayer Meeting a few years ago. The late venerable Dr. MURRAY, of Elizabeth, was relating some of his early experience: "Just across the way," in Ann-street, he said he "where the brick stores are, there stood thirty years ago an humble dwelling inhabited by a pious old negro woman, and every Sabbath afternoon some young men held a prayer meeting in her room; they were mostly clerks at the time, toiling hard for their daily bread, and their educational advantages were small. But what has become of them?" continued the doctor. "One of them has become a statesman and is now representing the Republic in a foreign Court; another has been Mayor of the City of New-York; another is a partner in one of the largest publishing houses in the country; several have become princely merchants, noted for their liberality, and two of them have become clergymen eminently blessed in turning many to righteousness, and two of them have departed in triumph to their heavenly home." When the doctor sat down a man rose in another part of the room and said, "I have recently visited the prison at Sing Sing. As I went from cell to cell, I met an old man who told me a very different story from that just narrated. He said that when he had power he belonged to an infidel club which met at a place not far from that just mentioned, and when I inquired as to the history of the young skeptics that composed it, "Ah," said he, "one of them committed suicide, another was murdered, several died in prison, and some by delirium tremens; I believe I am the only one remaining, and I am here a convict." This shows the tendency of the two systems as regards the life that now is; the contrast is very suggestive, and no words are needed to deepen the impression made by the simple statement. And the rule obtains also in public affairs. Mention anything that is good and desirable in the State, and that thing you may be sure, comes from the Gospel. Is it liberty? Where is liberty enjoyed except in Bible countries? Experience shows that freedom of suffrage is confined to so free dom of the Scriptures. Whence came the glorious sentiments of HAMPDEN but from these living fountains? Read the farewell address of WASHINGTON. What is its burden but this: that our liberty as a people, and our existence as a nation, depend upon our adherence to the spirit of religion. After showing how the spirit of the Gospel tended to cultivate peace, eradicate selfishness, inculcate love of our fellows and elevate and purify mankind, both as a means of happiness in this world and that which is to come, he concluded as follows: But there are cases (alluding to the influences of disease and sorrow and intemperance,) where mere change of scene cannot influence; there is a sorrow which corrodes the heart and withers the bloom of life which nature presents no cure, for which her laboratory has no specific. It is where hope is dead, and life has lost its outlook. Consumption or fever sets in and is given out as the difficulty, but back of this the germ, the cause of all is the secret wretchedness; this burrows into the soul, and like the Guinea worm, which buries itself in the foot of the West India slave, is all the more dangerous because it is out of sight. The waning one takes the proffered potion, but knows its uselessness. Of that which is killing him he never speaks. Did he but break the terrible silence, his words would be, "Cannot then minister to a mind diseased; pluck from the memory a rooted sorrow; raze out the written troubles of the brain, and with some sweet oblivious antidote cleanse the foul bosom of that perilous stuff which weighs upon the heart?" The remedy for this must come from above; the heavy case is a firm trust in God's unerring providence, who watches the falling sparrow. He cares for his birds—will He forget his children? The gloom is irradiated by the thought; the nerves become strengthened by the sense of God's guardian care; the deep-seated grief yields to the heroism of bravery, and the soul, illuminated by the prospect of a building of God and house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens, enkindles the dimmed eye and flushes again the pallid cheek. And oh! how powerful is the Gospel in those fierce diseases of appetite, the curse of our race, intemperance—it is usually an effect rather than a cause. Desolate, despondent, a man resorts to the cup to drown his trouble. What can you do? Take away the cup! Yes, but he will find it again; you had better take away his misery of heart; then his reformation will be permanent; give him the prospect of Heaven and it will cheer better than alcohol; give him the companionship of Jesus, and he will no more need the exhilleration of rum. Before any would seek to tear away this Gospel, then, let even its blessings for the present world be remembered,—its virtues, its charities, its alleviations of the miserable,—and the cry would burst forth, Rather let the sun be extinguished than be robbed of this our richest treasure.

Rev. E. H. Newton and the Reciprocal Duties of Pastor and Congregation.

Rev. E. HERER NEWTON, of Philadelphia, having accepted the call of the Anthon Memorial Church of this City, preached his first sermon there yesterday morning. He took as his text the 2d verse of the 14th chapter of Acts: "And when they had ordained them Elders in every church, and had prayed with fasting, they commended them to the Lord, on whom they believed."

The pastoral relation between a minister of the Church he should be compelled to forego the duties of parochial visiting until his connection with the Church Missionary Society is terminated, when he hoped to take full charge of the Church and fulfill all the duties required of him. He then delivered a sermon on the reciprocal duties of pastor and congregation. After tracing the institution of the pastoral office from the time of the Apostles downward, he said he did not believe in sudden conversions. He did not think that persons were often converted by one sermon. It was often difficult to determine when the lights of the Gospel had first entered the heart, and it was only by following up the good work, when once begun, that a conversion could be made permanent. Before, however, a pastor's sermons could have their due effect, he must place himself in such relation with his congregation that the electric spark that flew from his soul might touch theirs. Of the congregation, he said that it was necessary not only that they should come and listen to their pastor's sermons, but they must undertake the application of them. As physical health is not to be maintained merely by diet and proper clothing, but by the exercise of the muscles, the nerves and the brain, so it is not enough to listen to the Word, but we must also apply its teachings. The preacher then gave his idea of what a Church should be. Every member had it, he said, should be a working member. He could only consider a Church as doing its duty when, besides carrying on its Sabbath and infant schools, its women met periodically to devise means for relieving the wants of their poorer neighbors, and its men went out into the highways and byways to bring in those who needed the light of the Gospel. For himself, he said, he should preach to them Christ and Him crucified. As to the duties of the congregation toward their pastor, he should say nothing, as he believed that they had only fully understood them, but also practiced them.

Blessing the Corner-Stone of the New Church of the Holy Innocents.

The ceremony of blessing the corner-stone of the new Catholic Church of the Holy Innocents, now being erected in Thirty-seventh-street, near Broadway, was performed yesterday by Archbishop MCCLOSKEY, assisted by a number of the clergy of this City, in the presence of a vast concourse of people. The new edifice is to have a frontage on Thirty-seventh-street of 75 feet, and will be 120 feet in depth. The style of its architecture is English Gothic, with open trusses-work under the roof. Its height in the clear, will be 70 feet from the floor to the apex of the roof. Besides the church proper, however, there is to be a large and commodious annex, to be used for meetings of the church societies and for other religious purposes. The material of which the edifice is to be built is brick, but the front will have trimmings of Berea stone, quarried in Ohio, alternated with brown freestone from Belleville, N. J. The roof is to be of slate. Galleries will run the whole length of the church, and, in addition, there is to be a capacious organ-loft extending the width of the building. The pillars supporting the galleries are to be of iron, and from the capes of these will spring arches of wood to support the roof. The front windows will have a tracery of Berea stone, and the sills and lintels will be of the same material. There will be three front entrances, the centre one being very spacious. It is estimated that the church, when finished, will comfortably seat 1,500 people. The cost of the whole, including ground, is about $200,000. ERNESTUS is the architect.

The new edifice will occupy the site of the old Church of Holy Innocents, which the Catholics purchased from the Episcopal congregation now worshipping at the church of that name in Sixth-avenue, near West Forty-first-street. The Catholics have had service here for about three years past, the old Church requiring the slight decorations as was given it by the Episcopal founders, and which will be transferred to its more spacious, costly and elaborate successor. The pastor is Rev. JOHN LAMBIN; assistant pastor, Rev. Father FITZSIMMONS. Among the attendant priests assisting in the benediatory services yesterday, were Vicar-General STARRS, Rev. Drs. BURNELLE and MCNOBNY, Rev. Fathers QUINN, of St. Peter's, CURRAN, of St. Andrew's, CROWRY, of St. Gabriel's, LYNCH and FITZSIMMONS, of St. Vincent-Ferrer's, Fathers HEALEY, MONTENERY, DONELLY and many others. The services began by chanting the Psalmody, in which the priests and acolytes, followed by the Archbishop vested in cope and mitre, and bearing his crosier, after which the corner-stone was sprinkled with holy water (it was put in place a week ago, and has since been built upon.) The Litany of the Saints was then chanted by the Archbishop, the assembled priests joining in the response, after which the 132d Psalm, beginning, Nisi Dominus ædificaverit domum—"Unless the Lord build the house, they labor in vain who build it"—was chanted. The priests and the Archbishop then made the circuit of the building outside, chanting the Psalm Miserere Mei, Deus—"Have mercy on me, O God"—&c., while at the same time the sodalities of misses and young ladies connected with the Church entered the building and made the circuit inside. These sodalities are three in number, named the Sodality of the Infant Jesus," composed of very small children; "Sodality of the Holy Angels," and the "Children of Mary." All were dressed in white, with veils and wreaths, each of the first-mentioned sodality wearing a wreath of white flowers in addition. The appearance of these sodalities, as they filed into the edifice, each one being preceded by a silken banner bearing its name, was pleasing in the extreme. After the return of the procession to the platform, Rev. Father QUINN, of St. Peter's, ascended the pulpit and delivered a sermon appropriate to the occasion, when the rain commenced pouring down, dispersed the crowd, and ended the ceremonies—the full ritual exercises had fortunately, however, been concluded, the sermon being simply an addendum for the occasion.

Dedication of a German Lutheran Church in Brooklyn.

The German Evangelical Lutheran St. Mark's Church, on Evergreen-avenue, near Jefferson-street, Brooklyn, was dedicated yesterday. A good many Germans living in that neighborhood, the congregation was organized in January, 1868, and the building was begun in August last. The builder is Mr. WILLIAM NOLTE, a member of the congregation. The church is a fine frame building, with a stone foundation, forty-two feet front, sixty-four feet deep and fifty feet high, and has besides a steeple forty-two feet high. The basement is being used as a school-room for the children of the members of the congregation. The cost of the church is about $15,000, of which over $3,000 have been made up by collections. The altar and pulpit, which are made of mahogany wood, are from the former German Evangelical Lutheran St. Matthew's Church, on Walker-street, near Broadway, in this City. The new church is neatly handsomely decorated with garlands and wreaths, and on the altar with lilies and flowers in pots. Divine service was held in the forenoon in the German, and in the afternoon in the English languages. In the forenoon, when the dedication proper took place, after singing by the congregation, Rev. Dr. KROMER, President of East New-York, made the dedicatory address, speaking from First Kings, viii., 23-56, and 57-61, while Rev. J. H. BADES, of Brooklyn, delivered the sermon, preaching from Psalm xxviii., 1-9, and 8 and 9 verses. Rev. Dr. KROMER, of the Church of the Holy Trinity in Twenty-first-street, between Fifth and Sixth avenues, this City; and after the sermon the xxiii. Psalm was sung by the Long Island Saengerbund from Gilsey's chorus. A collection was then taken up, and the benediction pronounced by Rev. Dr. KROMER. The divine service was very well attended both in the forenoon and in the afternoon. The officers of the congregation are: Messrs. CHARLES ROHRIG, President; FRED. MOLL, Secretary; and BERNARD GIESE, Treasurer.

Sunday School Anniversary.

The anniversary of Avenue B M. E. Mission Sabbath School, City Sabbath School and Missionary Society was celebrated yesterday afternoon at No. 222 Avenue B. The exercises consisted of singing by the children, religious services and addresses by Rev. J. S. WILLIS, Rev. Dr. MCALLISTER, and others. The addresses were simple appeals to the children, couched in familiar phraseology that the youngest of them might comprehend. This school is doing a good work in the neighborhood in which it is located. Its average attendance is sixty. The field is a very wide one, and the laborers are few. Faithful teachers are needed in the school.

HUGH KELLY HOMICIDE.

Action of Coroner Schirmer on the Body of the Man who was Stunned to Death—Verdict of the Jury.

The case of HUGH KELLY, who died, as is alleged, from the effects of injuries sustained through an assault upon him on the 2d ult., in One Hundred and Thirteenth-street, was yesterday disposed of by Coroner SCHIRMER. The remains have been at the Morgue for several days, awaiting a permit from the Board of Health, which was persistently ref

REAL ESTATE TRANSACTIONS.

Last week was one of the most active of the season. Large sales were made every day except Monday. That day an important one was set down for, but the rain prevented, and it was postponed.

It seems a little odd to record a large and successful sale as having been made on the last day of the week, yet such a sale was made on Saturday last at Douglaston, L. I., by Messrs. A. J. BLEECKER, SON & CO. The day was particularly clear and beautiful, and the special train carried down as merry and enthusiastic a party as ever gladdened the heart of an owner or honored an auctioneer. The gallant old veteran who was to conduct the sale is a gentleman of the old country school, now, alas, too rare among us, whose Chesterfieldian manners and genuine good-heartedness made him, in his younger days, a particular favorite with the fair sex, among whom he has, if possible, gained in favor as he has grown in years. Knowing that where he was they would be cared for, they accepted his invitation and attended the sale in large numbers. Arriving on the ground, a regular old-fashioned clam-bake was served up, to which the two or three hundred guests did as full justice as they could. All were satisfied, but the clams were not all disposed of. What were left, however, made a nice little cold bite, after the sale, and before taking the cars. The result of this generous lunch was a party of good-humored ladies and gentlemen, who, with full stomachs, easy consciences, and a good opinion of the owner, were fully prepared to be interested in the lots he had to offer. The sale was a very gratifying one, the property was sold quickly, the prices were good, and the buyers and seller were alike satisfied. After the sale had closed, about an hour was given the party, which they improved by rambling over the grounds, picking strawberries and cherries, rowing on the lake, &c. About 5 o'clock the special train appeared and the crowd got aboard, laughing and joking, satisfied with themselves, with what they had done, and with everything about them. The day was in all respects a very enjoyable one, and in a business sense an excellent one. It is hard to determine which was best pleased, the buyer or the seller. The prices were very fair, but not extravagant, and both are to be congratulated—one that he made a good sale and the others that they made good purchases. Too much credit cannot be given to REUBEN J. TODD, Esq., partner with Mr. A. J. BLEECKER, for his excellent and complete arrangements. He possesses great energy, executive ability and keenness of perception, and to his efforts the visitors are indebted for the numerous little comforts which a less experienced and capable man would have overlooked, and which added so greatly to their enjoyment. Knowing the character of a large number of persons who intended attending this sale, a few rather disreputable persons sought to gain passage, and have a "good time," but Mr. TODD effectually spoiled their little game. Accompanied by a competent detective, he stood at the door leading from the waiting-room to the train, and refused admission to every objectionable person. The excellent effect of this action was a train-load of eminently respectable people, and not one undesirable passenger. On the way home one very stupid blunder was made by the railroad officials, for which they of course are alone to blame. Arriving at Flushing, the passengers in the last car were for some reason or other ordered to alight; they did so. While they were waiting for further instructions a train from New-York came in, and during the confusion of landing its passengers, the special train slipped away, leaving a large number of excursionists to wait an hour for another train. This sort of thing should not happen. Some few of the younger people took it very good-naturedly, as a sort of joke to wind up the day's fun, but many of the elder ones were quite indignant.

The Bush estate, near the village of Port Chester, comprising 22½ acres of land, was also sold Saturday. Mr. LAWTON purchased about 17 acres on the west side of King-street, opposite the old homestead, for $600 per acre, and Mr. L. M. DAVENPORT, of New-Rochelle, purchased the balance of 210 acres for $400 per acre.

To-day will be perfectly quiet. To-morrow the very attractive Hamilton Park property, on Staten Island, will be disposed of by Messrs. A. J. BLEECKER, SON & CO. The arrangements are extensive and very perfect, and no effort will be left untried to make the day a pleasant one, and the sale a success. Special accommodations will be provided for the ladies who intend accompanying their gentlemen friends on the occasion, and every facility afforded them to examine the property, so that they may bid understandingly. The lots are very desirable, beautifully located and in excellent neighborhood. They should command high prices. The boat will start at 10:30 A. M. Free tickets, maps and particulars may be had at the auctioneer's office, No. 77 Cedar-street, or of Mr. C. K. HAMILTON, at his office, No. 26½ Broadway.

The same day Messrs. A. D. MELLICK, Jr. & BRO. have a large sale at Cranford, N. J. Cranford is situated 40 minutes from New-York side of the river, on the Central Railroad of New-Jersey, and in the midst of a high, rolling, undulating country. The town proper has a population of about 2,000, rapidly increasing, with good churches, schools and stores. The Pearson property is situated just 1,850 feet east of the station, fronting on the railroad; the property ascends regularly and gradually from the track, thus perfect drainage is secured, as well as charming views being obtained of the mountains and surrounding country. The Rahway River flows picturesquely near this property, and adds to the attractions formed by the neighboring hills and beautiful country. This property is really in handsome condition, the streets having been graded with great care, and they are all nicely finished. A large amount of money has been spent by the owners in thorough drainage with pipes, so that the streets will always be dry and in good driving condition. A special train will leave the foot of Liberty-street at 11 A. M. Lunch on the arrival of the train. Free tickets, maps and full particulars may be had at the auctioneers' office, No. 26 Pine-street.

On Wednesday, Messrs. JOHNSON & MILLER promise a day of complete jollity. A free excursion, a regular old-fashioned Rhode Island clam-bake, and a chance to buy anywhere from one to one hundred and fifty choice ville plots in the aristocratic town of Islip at moderate prices, and inducements scarcely to be resisted. The property is in many ways very desirable; one can stand on the shore and catch bass and bluefish with a rod and reel. These are the first ville plots offered at auction at this place. They adjoin the magnificent residences of Messrs. SHRAPED KNAPP and BRADDER JOHNSON, and form a part of the Governor Smith Farm. A special invitation is extended to the ladies, for whose accommodation special arrangements will be made. The excursion train will leave the foot of South Eighth-street, Williamsburg, at 9:45 A. M. Maps and free tickets at the auctioneer's office, No. 26 Nassau-street.

The same day the Central New-Jersey Land and Improvement Company will sell 300 plots at Dunellen, N. J. This town is about 27 miles from New-York and 2½ miles from the City of Plainfield, and is remarkable for the beauty and healthfulness of its location. The soil is a sandy loam, very dry, and yet rich and productive. It has been handsomely improved; broad streets and drives have been laid out, intersecting each other at right angles. Washington Rock, celebrated in Revolutionary history, is only two miles distant. To persons of moderate means, seeking a home in the country, this place offers rare attractions. Land purchased now at this place must prove a very profitable investment, as the future of Dunellen is very readily foretold, lying, as it does, in so close proximity to Plainfield. That prosperous and rapidly-growing city is fast spreading, and at no very distant day will embrace Dunellen as one of its suburbs. Special train from foot of Liberty-street at 11 A. M. on day of sale. Refreshments on arrival of train. For railroad passes, maps and full particulars, apply at the office of the Central New-Jersey Land Improvement Company, No. 113 Liberty-street, New-York; A. D. HOFE, General Agent.

Other sales will be made during the week which will be fully noticed hereafter.

Several sales will be made at the Exchange Auctioneers. One of the most important will be made to-morrow, at 12 o'clock, consisting of 400 plots of land, containing more than 1,200 lots, at Cliff Park, part of the Van Cortlandt estate. The Park is in the lower part of Westchester County, adjoining Jerome Park on the north; wide avenues have been opened through it, and the land fronting on these and the old Highways by which the Park is bounded, has been divided into plots containing from one to about forty city lots. It is but half a mile from the City of New-York, but a short distance from Fordham, Williamsbridge and Kingsbridge, and the route of the railroad to connect with the Highland Suspension Bridge across the Hudson, which is to bring the Pacific Railroad into the City, is along the entire length of the property, not 400 yards distant. A station is to be erected within a minute's walk.

Auction Sales Saturday.

The Murder of Hugh Kelly.

The body of HUGH KELLY, who died in Newark, N. J., on Tuesday last from the effects of injuries received in this City on the 24 of May last, is still at the Morgue. After the death of KELLY in Newark, Coroner CHASE gave permission to remove the body, as it was becoming decomposed, but the object of this action on his part has not been secured, as the authorities here desire to hold an inquest upon the body. The inquest commenced by Coroner CHASE on Thursday last was adjourned to to-day, after the testimony of the mother and the sister of the deceased had been taken. The substance of their testimony, which has hitherto been withheld, is as follows:

On the evening of the 24 day of May, the deceased became involved in a quarrel concerning the possession of a dog with some parties who kept a saloon under the apartments occupied by his mother, his sister and himself, at the corner of One Hundred and Thirteenth-street and Second-avenue. KELLY ran away to escape the men with whom he had quarrelled, but he subsequently came down the street to walk out with his sister. They went up Second-avenue together for some distance, when KELLY, having purchased some articles that he desired to take with him, turned back toward the house. Miss KELLY saw him walk down the street, and she also saw MICHAEL RAFFERTY, JOHN DUFFY and PETER MCMANUS, three of the party with whom KELLY had quarreled in the saloon, coming in the opposite direction. One of them said: "There is Hughey." The young lady did not witness any demonstrations of violence. She went on her way, and it was not until she returned, late in the evening, that she learned that her brother was injured. He had been brought into the house from the place where he was found, bathed in blood.

KELLY recovered so far as to be able to narrate the circumstance of his affray with the three men after he had left his sister. After he had met and passed them, they followed him, and one of the number struck him with a stone upon the side of his head. He ran a short distance from them and fell upon the pavement insensible.

The post mortem examination showed that the skull was fractured, and that abscess of the brain ensued, causing his death.

The circumstances which led to KELLY's removal to Newark while he was still living, were these: RAFFERTY, one of his assailants, was arrested for the part which he took in the affray, and was held to bail in $1,000 to answer. He then attempted to "settle it" by the payment of $200. The money was refused by Mrs. KELLY, and the three assailants formed another plan to get KELLY out of the way, so as to afford them, if possible, an opportunity to escape the punishment for their crime. They subscribed money enough to pay the doctor's bill, and procured his removal to a remote and cheap air for the injured man. KELLY was accordingly sent to Newark, where he died.

AQUINUS AND THE BISHOP.

A SONNET.

BY JOHN G. SAXE.

Increase of worldly wealth is not alway
With growth in grace in manifest accord;
So quaint Aquinus hinted to my lord,
The Bishop,—when upon a certain day,
Surprised while counting o'er his ample hoard
Of shining pelf, he turned in a offer frowned—
The prelate said, "The time, you see, has gone
When dear old Mother Church was forced to beg."
(Lets second!) "Gold and silver have I none!"
"Ah!" quoth Aquinus, shrewdly, "so I find;
But that, your Grace, was in the purer age,
The age when priests were pleased to bear in mind,
When with her foes brave battle she could wage,
And say to scoffed Satan, "Get behind!"

THE DOUBLE LIFE;

OR,

THE HAMPTON MYSTERY.

BY MRS. HARRIET LEWIS.

CHAPTER I.

THE LADY BEATRICE.

Had she lived before the siege of Troy,
Helen, whose beauty summoned Greece to arms,
And drew a thousand ships to Ilium bay,
Had not been named in Homer's Iliad;
Her name had been in every line he wrote.
MARLOWE.

The Lady Beatrice Hampton, only child of the Earl of Hampton, had passed her youth and early womanhood, and was still unmarried. She had no lack of suitors, for she had inherited from her mother an immense fortune, and was beautiful, witty, accomplished, a reigning belle, and a leader in society. Her friends were puzzled at her adherence to celibacy, and no one was more puzzled than her father, whose greatest desire was to see her happily married. It was an unsolvable problem to the Earl, that his daughter should persist in refusing the most eligible offers, and she was looked upon, even by her admirers, as a beautiful mystery, a delightful puzzle, a marble-hearted and incomprehensible Sphynx.

One March evening, in the drawing-room of his town-house, Lord Hampton sat thinking of his daughter. The night was wild and stormy. The pleasant room presented a strong contrast to the gloom without. A sea-coal fire flamed in the polished grate. The great chandelier flooded the room with light. Flowers, fresh from the greenhouse, with moisture yet upon their petals, were crowded with profusion into vases whose delicate sculpture would have fired an artist's heart. The heavy warm-hued curtains fell in folds to the floor, shutting out the darkness, and shutting in the light and warmth and fragrance.

The Earl was tall and stately, with becoming portliness of figure, and eyes as keen as in his early youth, a complexion of unusual ruddiness, hair and whiskers of iron-gray, and manly features, whose expression inclined to sternness. He had almost reached threescore years and ten, but he exhibited none of the feebleness of age. His mind retained its vigor, and his manners were those of the courtly old-school gentleman.

His thoughts were evidently anxious and troubled. He roused himself from them at last, and stretched out his hand toward the bell-pull. At that moment the curtains dividing the apartment from a second drawing-room were lifted and the Lady Beatrice entered.

"You sent for me, father?" she inquired, approaching him. "You desired to see me?"

"I did, Beatrice," responded his Lordship. "I have something of importance to say to you."

The Lady Beatrice stood leaning against the marble mantel-piece in an expectant attitude.

She was a superbly beautiful woman. At least four and thirty years of age,she looked scarcely five and twenty.

Lord Hampton looked at her with a father's pride, yet with a strange expression. This being, so cold to others, was equally cold to him. He wondered if she ever experienced any womanly emotions, and, while he wondered, the Lady Beatrice broke the silence:

"You have news from your friend Lord Adlowe, have you not?" she asked.

"Yes; his Lordship has returned to England," replied the Earl. "I received a line from him this morning, informing me that he arrived in town last evening. I called upon him, and invited him to dine with us to-day. He is all impatience to see you. It is of Lord Adlowe that I am about to speak to you."

The Lady Beatrice bowed her head without speaking. Encouraged by her attentiveness, the Earl resumed:

"Lord Adlowe comes back to us, after his five years' journeying, more than ever your slave. He has been for eight years your faithful lover. It was you who made him an exile and a wanderer. He has kept himself single, waiting patiently, never reproaching you for your coldness, never forcing his attentions upon you."

"Because he never dared to!" interposed the Lady Beatrice, with an icy smile. "I do not like Ormond Adlowe, father. He is false and bad at heart, his years of devotion to me notwithstanding. He has returned to renew his persecutions of me. He is tired of roving, I suppose, and his coffers need replenishing. Of all my suitors I like him least. I must repeat what I have said so many times to you and to him. I shall never marry."

"And why not?" demanded the Earl. "Have you realized that time is slipping away, and that you are advancing in years? How long will it be before you will be pushed aside in society by younger rivals. I shall soon die, and you will be left alone. I long to see you mistress of your own household, a happy wife. Can it be that you are still mourning for that misguided Geoffrey Trevelyan—the unworthy scion of a noble house, the midnight robber of his uncle—"

"Stop!" said the Lady Beatrice, a swift flush overspreading her features. "I do not care to hear Geoffrey Trevelyan's name. They say he is dead."

"Yes, he is dead," said the Earl, thoughtfully. "He died many years ago, in a foreign land—poor fellow! After all he was but a boy, and his untimely fate always seemed to me hard. He had in him the stuff for a noble man, but was warped by harshness and evil surroundings. Had Lord Trevelyan, his uncle, whose heir he was, treated him like a nephew, instead of like his slave, Geoffrey might have been living, and honored to-day. I don't blame you for grieving for him, for you were his betrothed wife. But he was unworthy and is dead. You were but a mere child when he disappeared. Surely you can not cherish a love for his memory still."

"I am not romantic, father," said the Lady Beatrice, dryly. "You say that all men are not like him, meaning that Lord Adlowe is without Geoffrey's weaknesses and faults. Lord Adlowe is not weak, but his is not the strength I like. The truth is, I cling to my freedom, father. I like to rule in society. I like to be admired and worshipped, but I have no heart for my admirers to win. I have no heart."

"You must not disappoint the hopes I have so long cherished, Beatrice!" questioned her father, bitterly. "Have you no love for me, no respect for my wishes? What would your loved 'society' say if it knew that you are a mystery to your own father? When Lord Adlowe was here five years since, he told me that you had pleading a double life. His words have been confirmed in many times since by my own observation. You do lead a double life. You are one thing and seem another."

Beatrice started, lowering her gaze to the fire, as if she feared her soul might look from her eyes and play its traitor.

"I do not understand you!" she murmured.

"I will endeavor to explain," returned the Earl, gravely. "You are the mistress of my household. You receive our visitors, preside at our balls and parties, and fulfill your duties to society. But day after day, evening after evening, you mysteriously shut yourself up in your own apartments, seeing no one, replying to no summons or message, giving no evidence of life. It is as if your chambers were your tomb. I have frequently knocked at your door without eliciting a response. The last time I was attacked by the gout, I sent for you, and yet you did not come to me for hours, and did not even send to inquire after my welfare. What is the explanation of this, Beatrice?"

The daughter stood motionless and silent.

"I have tried to answer the question for myself," said the Earl, after waiting in vain for a reply. "If it were possible for you to leave the house as continually without my knowledge, I should believe that half your time was spent away from home. I have researched that these seclusions do not occur at our country-seat. Do you spend these missing hours in opium-eating dreams? I again ask you, Beatrice, what is the meaning of these seasons of dumbness and silence!"

The Lady Beatrice lifted her head, turning her face to the light. Her countenance was of marble whiteness, save that in her cheeks burned a scarlet glow. Her eyes were like glowing suns. Her manner betrayed an intense agitation and excitement, showing that her whole nature was in commotion.

"I have no explanations to give, father," she said, a tremor of passion underlying her cold tones. "Think what you will—suspect as you may—I have nothing to say. Believe anything that may seem probable. But do not forget that I am your daughter, as proud as yourself. I know I would rather die than sully the name I bear. Let that suffice!"

She stood erect in her imperial beauty, like one without a trace of weakness in heart or soul.

At that moment the curtains were again lifted, and Lord Adlowe entered the apartment.

There was a peculiar gleam in his eyes, and a singular smile about his mouth; he had been a listener to most of the conversation between the father and daughter.

Lord Adlowe was in the prime of manhood. He was a handsome man, and years of foreign travel, with strange adventures in far off lands, had contributed a halo of romance to his character. His complexion had been darkened by exposure to wind and sun. His hair was light, and he wore a mustache and beard, full and curled, and had in them at times a wicked light.

He had returned impoverished in purse, hampered by debts, worn out by dissipation, with the fixed resolve of urging to a consummation his claims upon the hand of the Lady Beatrice.

At sight of her, so radiant in her beauty, his face flushed with eagerness, and he came forward rapidly, extending both his hands.

Lord Hampton, delighted, sprang up to greet him.

The Lady Beatrice permitted her returned lover to clasp her cold hands, greeting him politely, even kindly, her manner warming under his manifestations of extreme delight. She welcomed him home, and colored slightly under his gaze of eager admiration.

The Earl, encouraged by her gracious manner, began to hope that his conversation had had the desired effect, and that his daughter might be persuaded to gratify his dearest hopes.

"You must excuse my abrupt, unannounced entrance," said Lord Adlowe, smiling, when the greetings were concluded. "I told the porter, who knew me at once, that I would announce myself, as I used to do. I find the place unchanged; not so, I hope, its hostess."

He looked earnestly at his lovely hostess, whose manner had resumed its usual hauteur and reserve.

"I never change, Lord Adlowe," she replied significantly. "I have always been your friend and well-wisher. I am still the same."

"Nothing more!" whispered the guest, in a low and eager tone.

The increasing coldness of the lady's manner was sufficient answer.

Nothing daunted by this reception, Lord Adlowe exerted himself to please, Beatrice unbent slightly as she became interested in his remarks. His Lordship had changed during his long absence; many of his former prominent traits seemed subdued, and his hostess began to believe that she should find him an interesting study.

In the midst of her musings and speculations, dinner was announced. The Lady Beatrice took the arm of the guest, and the three descended to the dining-room, a handsome apartment, brilliant with lights and fire and flowers. The repast was seasoned with witty remarks from Lord Adlowe. The lady listened and smiled, and replied, but there was no heart in her words or her mirth. The dinner over, the guest escorted the Lady Beatrice to the door, and then returned to his wine and the companionship of the Earl.

"The Lady Beatrice is more beautiful than ever!" he finally sighed. "And she is scarcely less cold than when first I saw her, years ago."

"Do not despair, my boy," responded the Earl, kindly. "I don't pretend to understand Beatrice, but there is no ice that the sun cannot melt. I believe she will yet reward your long and unwavering devotion."

"I know she will!" said Lord Adlowe, with a smile, and with a strange light leaping to his eyes. "I can find my way to her heart at last, my Lord. In less than six months I shall be your son-in-law. I will go up to the Lady Beatrice and endeavor to win her favor, while you are occupied with your wine and cigars."

He excused himself, and hastened back to the drawing-room. The Lady Beatrice sat before the fire alone. She looked up at his entrance, greeting him with a smile. Drawing an easy-chair as near to her as he dared, Lord Adlowe was soon pouring his love.

The Lady Beatrice moved uneasily under his gaze, it seeming to her to be scrutinizing as well as admiring. She fancied he was trying to read her soul, and she took up the small hand-screen she had dropped before, saying, with an appearance of polite interest:

"I understood my father to say, Lord Adlowe, that you are stopping at a hotel. Is not your uncle, Lord Trevelyan, in town?"

"No, he is at Trevelyan Park," was the response. "I shall run down to see him to-morrow. I hear that my uncle is more miserly than ever. The town-house is let, and he confines himself closely to the Park, leading a savage and morose existence."

"I have heard the same," replied the Lady Beatrice. "Lord Trevelyan has changed greatly during the past fifteen years. You will visit him to-morrow?"

"Yes. My uncle is very exacting, and would hardly forgive me if he knew that I had visited even here before coming to him. People would talk too, if I were not attentive to him," and Lord Adlowe smiled, "for at his death he will leave me one of the richest men in the kingdom. You know that my claims upon him are second only to those of Geoffrey Trevelyan, my cousin. Had Geoffrey lived, I should have little to look forward to."

"Lord Trevelyan is fonder of you than he was of your cousin, is he not?" asked the Lady Beatrice, staring into the fire.

"He professes to be," was the reply. "I hope he is, for I be poor Geoffrey as it he had been a deadly enemy. Geoffrey had no test to manage him. Poor fellow! Geoffrey was not fitted to cope with the world. If he had lived, he would have covered his name with disgrace."

"Not so!" interrupted the Lady Beatrice, a hot flush glowing in her cheeks and an angry light shining in her eyes. "Geoffrey was a wild, passionate boy, with great faults, perhaps, but also with great virtues—"

"Do you number his assault upon and robbery of his uncle among the former or the latter?" questioned Lord Adlowe, with ironical emphasis. "If Geoffrey were alive," he added, impressively, "my uncle would leave no effort untried to bring him to punishment. Lord Trevelyan is very vindictive in his disposition."

"He might forgive and forget, since he believed Geoffrey dead," said the Lady Beatrice in a low tone, and with averted face.

"It is seventeen years since we heard that Geoffrey was dead, is it not?" asked Lord Adlowe, as if musingly, but with the keenness and most furtive of glances directed toward his hostess. "We received a Brazilian paper—I think it was Brazilian; at any rate it was South American—with a notice of his death in its columns. We also received a letter from some Spaniard or Portuguese, stating that Geoffrey had died at his house, and had begged him with his last breath to write tidings of his fate. There was inclosed in the letter a certificate of burial. Upon these data we believed Geoffrey to be dead."

"The evidence was conclusive enough, I should think," said Lady Beatrice, in a cold voice.

"Of course it was conclusive," replied Lord Adlowe. "But I have doubts sometimes of its truth. What if the whole story of the death were an imposture? Geoffrey knew that our uncle hated him enough to pursue him over the whole earth. He would not have dared return to England for fear of imprisonment and disgrace. It is not improbable that Geoffrey should have forged proofs of his death, changed his name, and settled down somewhere in a distant country to await news of my uncle's death. Lord Trevelyan dead, Geoffrey can walk the earth again without fear, a rich and titled man."

"A rather fanciful explanation, I think," said the Lady Beatrice, in a voice firmer than usual. "If it were true, and Geoffrey were to return, you would not be pleased, I suppose."

Lord Adlowe's face darkened at the mere possibility of such an event.

"Geoffrey returned! I would improvise me," he said. "He is Lord Trevelyan's brother's son, and of course the nearest heir. If Geoffrey were to come back at my uncle's death, he would inherit the Trevelyan title and fortune. But eighteen years of silence, and the proofs too—surely he is dead!"

He uttered the last words in a tone of relief. His apprehensions had been quieted by the manner of the Lady Beatrice. For years he had been tormented by occasional doubts of his cousin's death, and he had finally persuaded himself that, if living, Geoffrey Trevelyan would have communicated the fact to his former betrothed. He had watched her keenly and closely, and had become convinced that she believed Geoffrey
